Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 21, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock noon, by Mr. WALSH as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, while clouds and darkness are round about Thy throne, yet in Thee there is no darkness at all. Thou art the giver of all light and the glory of all life. Let Thy ministry upon us this day be full of grace and full of truth. God be merciful unto us and cause His light to fall upon us. Lift the whole level of our lives to a plane where the human heart shall forget its troubles and all labor shall not be a burden. Then shall our weakness be transformed into strength and our ignorance into wisdom. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, June 17, 1921, was read and approved.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE MASON, OF ILLINOIS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is in receipt of a cablegram from the President of the Senate of Porto Rico expressing sorrow at the death of the late Representative MASON. Without objection, the Chair will have the cablegram read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SAN JUAN, P. R., June 19.

SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.:

News of death of Porto Rico's great friend, Representative MASON, has caused painful impression. His last letter to president of this senate—June 8—offering his decided support to resolution introduced by Representative Williams in favor of Porto Rico has been entered on the record of this senate with the expression of the senate's deep sorrow over the great loss of that great Nation and this small island, so much in need of good and generous friends such as he.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 6320) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 775. An act to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to certify certain findings of fact, and for other purposes;

S. 1590. An act to add certain lands to the Wyoming National Forest;

S. 843. An act to amend section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes";

S. 667. An act for the relief of John B. H. Waring;

S. 1737. An act for the relief of Con Murphy;

S. 1254. An act providing for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Michigan;

S. 1288. An act to provide for the appointment of two additional judges of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York; and

S. J. Res. 36. Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a commission to confer with the Dominion Government or the provincial governments of Quebec, Ontario, and New Brunswick as to certain restrictive orders in council of the said Provinces relative to the exportation of pulp wood thereform to the United States.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on June 18 they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 4091. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Borderland Coal Corporation to construct a bridge across the Tug Fork of Big Sandy River, in Mingo County, W. Va.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To-day is unanimous-consent day under the rule. The Clerk will call the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

EXCHANGE OF GOVERNMENT LANDS IN HAWAII.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4598) to provide for the exchange of Government lands for privately-owned lands in the Territory of Hawaii.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill be allowed to go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

OPERATION OF GOVERNMENT RADIO STATIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the resolution (H. J. Res. 7) to amend section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1920.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the resolution be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

HOSPITAL FACILITIES FOR WAR-RISK PATIENTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6263) to amend an act entitled "An act providing additional hospital facilities for patients of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and of the Federal Board for Vocational Training, Division of Rehabilitation, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1921.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when this bill was last under consideration, during the consideration of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, the deficiency appropriation act had not yet been approved. This bill is in the identic phraseology incorporated in a provision in the deficiency appropriation act, and I therefore object to its consideration on this calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects to the consideration of the bill. The bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill which has just been reported remain on the table. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Wisconsin know by consultation with the author of this bill that it has been completely cared for in another way?

Mr. STAFFORD. I know by my own examination of the deficiency appropriation act that it has been, not by collaboration with any other.

Mr. ROGERS. I think that as a matter of courtesy to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] he ought to be given an opportunity to pass upon this question, and I therefore object.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will withhold his objection for a moment, I wish to say for the information of the gentleman from Massachusetts that when the bill was under consideration on the Unanimous Consent Calendar two weeks ago the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS], who reported the bill, asked unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice because the same provision was incorporated in the deficiency appropriation act. At that time the bill had not passed both branches of Congress. I have no objection to its remaining on the calendar, but I thought it would be an expeditious way to dispose of it, after it had been incorporated in another act, to have it laid on the table.

Mr. ROGERS. I think that with respect to this bill, after it has reached the stage that it has, we ought to have the sanction either of the man who introduced the bill or the man who reported it.

Mr. STAFFORD. We had the sanction of the gentleman from Nebraska two weeks ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

request I ask that the resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill has been stricken from the calendar at the instance of the gentleman from Wisconsin. The Clerk will report the next bill.

REERECTION OF THE LINCOLN STATUE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the resolution (H. J. Res. 127) to reerect the statue of Abraham Lincoln upon its original site.

The title of the resolution was read.

Mr. JAMES of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING], the author of the resolution, is in Chicago attending the funeral of his colleague, Mr. MASON, and at his request I ask that the resolution be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the resolution be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FURTHER RECLASSIFICATION OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6573) to further reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill of some importance. I want to know if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is going to give us any chance to be heard on it?

Mr. STEENERSON. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. So there will be liberal debate on it?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; whatever is desired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after July 1, 1921, postmasters of the fourth class shall be paid the same compensation as now provided by law, except that they shall receive 145 per cent of the cancellations of the first $75 or less per quarter, 70 per cent of the next $100 or less per quarter, and on the balance 60 per cent.

SEC. 2. That as a reward for faithful and meritorious service special clerks may be appointed in the executive, finance, money order, postal savings, registry, mailing, and other divisions of first-class post offices. Clerks in the executive, finance, money order, postal savings, registry, and other divisions of first-class post offices who were designated as special clerks, finance clerks, cashiers, foremen, bookkeepers, chief stamp clerks, chief mailing clerks, and stenographers on June 30, 1920, and who were, on and after July 1, 1920, assigned as clerks of grade 5 shall, from and after the passage of this act, unless they were demoted for cause, be given the designation and status of special clerks, and assigned to the first or second grade: Provided, That clerks who have been designated as special clerks shall not be demoted except for cause.

SEC. 3. That clerks and carriers in the intermediate or automatic grades who were appointed to regular positions before June 5, 1920, and are receiving less than the maximum grade of salary, shall receive credit for all time served as substitute on a basis of one year for each 306 days of eight hours served as substitute, and be promoted to the grade to which such clerk or carrier would have progressed had his original appointment as substitute been to grade 1.

SEC. 4. That, effective July 1, 1921, the minimum salary of foreman in first-class offices shall be $2,100 per annum.

SEC. 5. That, effective July 1, 1921, the minimum salary of assistant superintendents of mails in post offices with receipts of $1,000,000, but less than $2,000,000, shall be $2,300 per annum.

SEC. 6. That, effective July 1, 1921, the salary of assistant postmasters at offices of the second class, where the gross postal receipts are $8,000, but less than $12,000, shall be $1,850 per annum.

SEC. 7. That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to pay to the clerks in first and second class post offices and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service the amount due them as overtime in lieu of compensatory time for work performed by them on Sundays intervening between June 5 and July 1, 1920.

SEC. 8. That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to persons who have been retired under the act of Congress entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920, and who have since their retirement been employed in the Postal Service, the sums to which they are entitled for services heretofore rendered.

SEC. 9. That the paragraph in the act of Congress entitled "An act to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis," approved June 5, 1920 (p. 1053, Stat. L., 2d sess. 65th Cong.), which reads as follows: "On and after July 1, 1921, no supervisory official or employee in the Postal Service shall be promoted more than $300 during any one year, except when appointed postmaster, inspector in charge, or superintendent of the Railway Mail Service," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the Union Calendar and the House automatically considers it as in Committee of the Whole. The Clerk will read the first section for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read section 1.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I thought possibly the chairman was going to explain this bill in general debate.

Mr. STEENERSON. I shall be very glad to explain it.

Mr. BLANTON. While I have the floor I want to ask the gentleman a question or two. I notice that this bill is merely to cover little matters that were left out of the last bill in which postmasters and clerical help were reclassified.

Mr. STEENERSON. The object of the bill is to correct inequalities that arose in the administration of the general reclassification act passed June 5, 1920. That was the bill reported by the joint commission on salaries, which, as you know, held hearings all over the country. After the hearings were finished the bill was rushed through in a great hurry and some errors crept into it. Among other things fourth-class postmasters——

Mr. BLANTON. Were overlooked in large measure.

Mr. STEENERSON. For instance, the compensation of fourth-class postmasters was fixed at 145 per cent of the first $75 per quarter. That was, of course, more than their receipts. Then the bill provided that they should have a lower percentage on the next $50. When you come to figure it out you will see in the table in the report that the postmasters in some of these small offices received more when they canceled exactly $75 worth per quarter than they did when they canceled more.

Mr. WYANT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Who has the floor?

Mr. BLANTON. I have the floor, and I should like to control the line of interrogation.

Mr. WYANT. Will gentlemen please speak so they can be heard?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will not have any trouble in hearing my voice, because I am going to make it reach him. I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether or not, under this corrective bill, the fourth-class postmasters in small offices, who give all of their time and attention to their official duties, are to be paid salaries upon which they can live? They have not received such salaries in the past.

Mr. STEENERSON. This bill increases their compensation and makes it uniform in proportion to the amount of cancellations. Of course, there are many of these fourth-class postmasters who hold the office simply for the purpose of accommodating the public. I have fourth-class postmasters in my district who do not receive over $20 a quarter, or $80 per year. They do not cancel any more stamps than that. It only takes a few moments of their time. Now, it would not be feasible to pay such a postmaster a living wage out of the receipts of such an office. The object of the bill, as the title indicates, is to equalize the compensation and put these postmasters on an equitable basis. There was an error that crept into the classification bill in this, that after giving these postmasters 145 per cent of the first $75 a quarter, it then applied a lower percentage to the next $25, and that resulted in giving a man who canceled more than $75 less than one who canceled exactly $75 or less. Now, this corrects that, because it applies the percentage to the first $75 and then applies another percentage to the balance; and you will see by the table on the first page of the report exactly what that correction amounts to. The table is as follows and shows the present compensation and the compensation as it will be under the present bill:

Cancellation per quarter.	Act of June 5, 1920.	Amendment to 145 per cent on $75, 70 per cent on next $100, 60 per cent on remainder.
$76	91.20	109.45
$80	96.00	112.25
$90	108.00	119.25
$100	120.00	126.25
$101	115.75	126.95
$110	122.50	133.25
$120	130.00	140.25
$130	137.50	147.25
$140	145.00	154.25
$150	152.50	161.25
$175	171.25	178.75
$176	172.00	179.35
$200	190.00	193.75
$210	196.00	199.75
$250	220.00	223.75
$251	220.60	224.35
$275	235.00	238.75
$300	250.00	253.75
$350	280.00	283.75

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired. The Clerk will read the next section of the bill.

The Clerk read section 2, with the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 6, after the word "shall," insert "from and after the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, this amendment simply makes it certain that the provision is not retroactive. The Post Office Department desired that this amendment should be put into the bill prepared by the committee, and it was recommended unanimously by the committee. So I hope it will be agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read section 3.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, unless there is a desire for an explanation, I will presume this matter is quite familiar to all the Members of the House.

Mr. DYER. We do not need any explanation. The fact that the gentleman from Minnesota reported it is sufficient.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read section 4.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. Where a carrier has reached the retirement age and has been retired under the law on the annuity due him from the Government, and thereafter he is employed by the postmaster to do regular service on a regular salary, and he performs the regular service, I understand that under this section he can get his salary in lieu of the annuity. Is that the fact?

Mr. STEENERSON. This applies to certain employees who were retired. They were actually retired under the retirement act, and during the emergency of the Christmas holidays—I think that covers most of the cases—these men were employed to help out at so much an hour, just the same as any other employee would be hired.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has not quite caught my question. I want it understood, because I want to be sure that it reaches such cases. In my district, at Mineral Wells, Tex., a carrier who had been employed on a rural route, if I am not mistaken, was retired under the retirement act. Thereafter the postmaster, not being able to get help anywhere else, employed him on the regular service, and he performed that service for three months under contract with the postmaster that he was to receive the regular salary. Later he was informed by the Postmaster General that his salary could not be paid him because of the retirement act, unless the matter was corrected by Congress. Is this to correct such cases as that?

Mr. STEENERSON. Those cases will be corrected, as well as others.

Mr. BLANTON. And he will receive his pay?

Mr. STEENERSON. He will.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. As I understand, the employee who is retired and after retirement is employed for service by the department, under the provisions of this bill he would get his retirement pay and in addition thereto pay for his employment as well.

Mr. STEENERSON. This only applies retroactively. The comptroller had ruled that you could not pay the man who did the work after he was retired.

Mr. REAVIS. My question was in these cases where it does apply, whether retroactive or not, the employee would get the retirement pay and also pay for his employment as well.

Mr. STEENERSON. He would get his retirement pay and the pay that they agreed to give him.

Mr. REAVIS. Then when he was retired and afterwards employed again he would get double salary.

Mr. STEENERSON. This does not apply to any case in the future. It was supposed when this occurred that when they hired a rural carrier for a few days it was legal; but the comptroller held that it was illegal, and the question is whether we should refuse to pay these men or not. Some of these rural carriers, while it is true they were retired, they were not retired on a pension. They had not served long enough to draw an annuity, but were over the age of 65 and were retired without pay. I had a case of that kind in my district. He did the work, but they could not pay him under the law as construed by the comptroller.

The Clerk read section 9 of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I should be glad if the gentleman from Minnesota will be so kind as to tell us what that section means.

Mr. STEENERSON. The classification act of June 5, 1920, fixed salaries of clerks, carriers, and supervisory officials at such and such a figure. It did not, as heretofore had been the case, say that they should receive not exceeding a certain amount. It then provided as follows:

> No supervisory official or employee in the Postal Service shall be promoted more than $300 during any one year, except when appointed postmaster, inspector in charge, or Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service.

In many cases the difference in the salary between one position and the next highest is more than $300. The question arose as to one of these promotions, and the Comptroller of the Treasury decided that this clause applied to supervisory officials but not to the others. The question arose in the Second Assistant Postmaster General's office, where he wanted to promote an assistant chief clerk of the Railway Mail Service to the position of chief clerk. There was a difference, I think, of $600 in the salary. The assistant chief clerk was the one logically to be promoted, because he was next in line of promotion and was experienced and could be said to be qualified for the position, but the comptroller held that they could not appoint him but could appoint a clerk that received $1,800. I have printed in the report a large list of positions where this is true. The department sent down a request to the committee saying that there were so many cases where the supervisory officials were the next in line for promotion where the difference in salary as fixed by Congress was more than $300, and the only way out would be to appoint somebody still lower to put into the higher place, and they asked that the provision be repealed. If the classification law had stated that the salary shall not exceed a certain sum, then there would be discretion in the Postmaster General to allow a man to be promoted to a $3,000 position at a lower salary for the first year or two and then advance him. But this can not be done now.

Mr. PARRISH. In other words, the provision interferes with the promotion of the assistant to the position of chief in many cases where the assistant has been one who has rendered efficient service and valuable service and his promotion is meritorious, and without it there could not be any promotion from assistant to a chief in these cases?

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is right.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Can there be more than 100 per cent of anything?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is a mathematical problem upon which I would like to have the opinion of Mr. Einstein.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman provides payment for the fourth-class postmaster, that he shall receive 145 per cent of cancellations. Of course I know what the gentleman means; he means 100 per cent and then an equivalent of 45 per cent more.

Mr. STEENERSON. This is an old law; it was not originated by me.

Mr. BLANTON. The Postoffice Department understands by this expression that they are to pay fourth-class postmasters 100 per cent of all the cancellations and then, in addition thereto, an extra amount equal to 45 per cent.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; and they have been doing that since the law was first passed. Such a provision was put in three or four years ago.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that he should put in the words "equal or equivalent," so that it would read "he shall receive an amount equal or equivalent to"?

Mr. STEENERSON. Inasmuch as this is an old provision carried since 1918 and has been construed by the department to mean just what the gentleman has in his mind, I think it would not be well to change it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEENERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RIGHT TO OVERFLOW LAND ON FORT GEORGE WRIGHT MILITARY RESERVATION, WASH.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 2861) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to Lloyd E. Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., his heirs and assigns, the right to overflow certain lands on the Fort George Wright Military Reservation, at Spokane, Wash., on such terms as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I renew the point of order that I made when this bill was up the last time, when it was passed over without prejudice, that it is a private bill.

The bill, as the Chair will note, seeks to confer upon an individual a right to flood Government lands so as to permit this individual to have the benefits accruing from the right of flooding Government lands. I do not know whether it is necessary for me to call the attention of the Chair to various citations which uphold the contention that this is a bill of private character and is erroneously on the Calendar of Public Bills. I direct the attention of the Chair to the fact that the rule as to bills of this character are more strictly construed than in time past, and yet we have exceptions where even bills granting to individuals rights of a public character have been held to be private bills.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard in opposition to the point of order. I find myself somewhat embarrassed in attempting to present a parliamentary question to one so expert in that subject as the present occupant of the chair, but I feel it my duty to submit a few observations which I trust may be pertinent and which I hope the Speaker will bear in mind in passing on the question. I understand that it is frequently a very difficult matter to draw definitely a line of demarcation between a public and a private bill. I take it that in each case the matter rests largely in the sound discretion of the Speaker, guided by the provisions of the particular bill under consideration. I note the Speaker has just read this bill, but I desire to direct his attention to the fact that the bill by its terms confers no right whatsoever on Mr. Gandy. If this bill should be enacted by the Congress, Mr. Gandy will have no greater right than he possesses at this moment. This bill authorizes the Secretary of War to discharge a public function with respect to one of the military reservations of the United States. It is true that in the exercise of that power he may take action which incidentally will result in a benefit to an individual, but the power itself is the thing in contemplation by this bill. In the absence of the bill the Secretary of War would have no jurisdiction in the premises at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBSTER. Not now. Not only is that true, but this bill authorizes the Secretary of War, in behalf of the United States Government, to accept title to certain real estate to be conveyed to the Government. The bill also empowers the Secretary of War to institute condemnation proceedings for the purpose of acquiring property to constitute a part of the public domain and to be included in one of the military reservations of the United States.

I do not imagine that it will be contended that this bill is a private bill, because it has no relation to the appropriation of Government property directly or indirectly under the rule, because I think it is settled under the precedents that a bill granting the right of way over Indian lands or the military reservations of the Government is held to be a public bill. The indirect authorization contemplates the granting of an easement which is nothing more than a right of way. In one case it may be for a railroad, in another for a wagon road, and in still another an easement for the overflowing of the land by water, but the principle involved is precisely the same. It is granting an easement in real estate the title to which is vested in the Federal Government. I submit that under the precedents I have had great difficulty in my own mind in determining the question presented, but I find comfort in the thought that it will be passed upon by one much more competent than I.

In this connection I call the Speaker's attention to this language, found in volume 4, Hinds' Precedents, page 248:

> Bills frequently contain provisions of a public character which at the same time are designed to benefit or promote private enterprise. It is difficult in such cases to determine with uniformity in which category these bills should be classed.
> Bills authorizing the construction of bridges and bills granting the right of way to railroads through Indian, military, or other reservations have frequently been treated as private, while similar bills have at other times been considered to be public bills.

Following that announcement the writer says:

> The practice of the House has been generally in accordance with these distinctions, although bills for the incorporation of companies, bills authorizing the construction of bridges, and bills allowing rights of way through Indian or Government reservations are now generally treated as public.

I submit that this bill has been reported to the House of Representatives four times by the Committee on Military Affairs with the recommendation that it pass. On each of those occasions the Speaker has referred it to the Calendar of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That occurred twice during the incumbency of the beloved ex-Speaker, Mr. Clark, and twice during the incumbency of the present Speaker of the House of Representatives. I cite that as persuasive, showing that two Speakers in assigning this bill to a calendar have assigned it to the calendar on which it now appears. I respectfully submit the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of order that the bill H. R. 2861, which has been reported by title, which authorizes the Secretary of War to grant to Lloyd E. Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., his heirs and assigns, the right to overflow certain lands on the Fort George Wright Military Reservation, at Spokane, Wash., on such terms as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and for other purposes, is improperly upon the Union Calendar, because it is a private bill.

As the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] has stated, it is at times difficult to draw the line between bills of this character under the rules and to determine whether or not they belong upon one calendar or another. The Chair has examined the provisions of this bill, and in the view of the Chair the legislation proposed is such as to grant certain rights and privileges to an individual, and as an incident to that grant or benefit which is to be conferred certain powers are given to the Secretary of War, authorizing him to require the fulfillment of certain conditions and to require the beneficiaries to fill in some land or to erect certain structures made necessary by the grant of the particular privilege or benefit to the individual named in the bill. The Chair finds on examining the precedents that in the Fifty-ninth Congress, the Speaker—at that time the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]—ruled upon the question as to what calendar certain bills similar in import to this belonged—Hinds' Precedents, volume 3, section 2614.

Mr. Speaker CANNON at that time stated that it had been the practice in Parliament and also in Congress to consider as private bills such as are for the interest of individuals, public companies or corporations, a parish, city, or county, or other locality.

To be a private bill, it must not be general in its enactments, but for the particular interest or benefit of a person or persons. A pension bill for the relief of a soldier's widow is a private bill, but a bill granting pensions to such persons as a class instead of as individuals is a public bill.

The Chair has examined the citation to which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] has referred, and feels that while this bill contains general provisions, the reason the general provisions are contained in the bill is because legislation is proposed granting a certain thing or benefit to an individual, and not to any particular class or any particular community. The right granted is for the benefit of Mr. Lloyd Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., or his heirs or assigns. While it is true it affects the military reservation or other Government property, the Chair feels that the bill clearly comes within the rule requiring that bills for the benefit or rights of certain individuals should be treated as private in their character.

The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill is automatically transferred to the Private Calendar.

SENATE BILLS AND SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 36. Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a commission to confer with the Dominion Government or the provincial governments of Quebec, Ontario, and New Brunswick as to certain restrictive orders in council of the said Provinces relative to the exportation of pulp wood therefrom to the United States; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 667. An act for the relief of John B. H Waring; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1288. An act to provide for the appointment of two additional judges of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 1737. An act for the relief of Con Murphy; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1590. An act to add certain lands to the Wyoming National Forest; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 1254. An act providing for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Michigan; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 843. An act to amend section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

S. 775. An act to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to certify certain findings of fact, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. To ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. GORMAN] may have unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of post offices and post roads.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his colleague may have unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of post offices and post roads. Does the gentleman refer to the measure which has just passed?

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman inform us whether his colleague, in the extension of his remarks, will give us any information as to the exact method that is going to be followed in the appointment of postmasters of the presidential class?

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I can not say.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENDING LIMIT OF INDEBTEDNESS, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5756) to amend an act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands," approved August 29, 1916.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may we have the bill reported?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5756) to amend an act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands," approved August 29, 1916.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands," approved August 29, 1916, be amended, as follows:

That the proviso of section 11 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows: "Provided, however, That the entire indebtedness of the Philippine government created by the authority conferred herein shall not exceed at any one time the sum of $30,000,000, exclusive of those obligations known as friar land bonds, nor that of any Province or municipality, a sum in excess of 7 per cent of the aggregate tax valuation of its property at any one time. In computing the indebtedness of the Philippine government, bonds not to exceed $10,000,000 in amount, issued by that government, secured by an equivalent amount of bonds issued by the Provinces or municipalities thereof, shall not be counted."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the limit is now.

Mr. TOWNER. The limitation, I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina, fixed by the fundamental act in 1915, was $15,000,000, and remains unchanged in the law at the present time.

Mr. STEVENSON. The proposition is now to raise it to $30,000,000?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, sir; I will say to the gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Texas withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold it, but does the gentleman think it ought to come up on unanimous-consent day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that while it may be improper to call it up on unanimous-consent day, it is a unanimous report of the Committee on Insular Affairs after careful consideration, and it is a bill which I certainly think the House understands fully and has no objection to its passing. If it does not come up in this way it will probably come up by suspension, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas withdraws the objection. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was again reported.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, the extension which is asked for in this bill would be perfectly justified merely in the ordinary course, because the business of the Philippine Islands, the progress and development of their commercial interests, the increase of the wealth of the islands, would make $15,000,000 as a limitation altogether too small an amount. Conditions, however, warrant action outside of those considerations. The islands are, of course, really in the constructive stage. They need everything that a government needs. The islanders have made most marvelous progress and development during the brief period that the islands have been under American control. During the last few years, especially, they have made remarkable progress and improvement in their business conditions. When the act of August 29, 1916, was passed the annual revenues of the Philippine government were $13,000,000. In 1919 they were $36,000,000. The estimated revenues for the year 1920 will be about $42,000,000, so that in that brief period their annual revenues have increased more than three times over. The wealth of the islands has also increased three or four times since they have been under American occupancy. But we have this condition. As I said before, everything that a new government needs must be secured in the Philippines. They need roads, and they are building them as rapidly as they can. They need all kinds of public buildings, especially schoolhouses; all of the needs of a new government that can be imagined. In those islands they need very much indeed the development of water power and irrigation plants. The government has been almost compelled to desist from carrying out its propositions with regard to these matters. They have been compelled to use their resources for other purposes largely. They were compelled to take over the railroad and invest in that about $6,000,000, and I will say, Mr. Speaker, this is a remarkable fact, that even now under existing conditions that railroad is paying and bringing in a small profit. It is much better than most railroads are doing here. It was absolutely necessary, as they considered it, to take over the railroad as conditions were such that the railroad would go into bankruptcy unless the government took it over. They have been compelled to invest in other things. So that their funds have been for some time absolutely exhausted. Besides this, they have always been able to maintain a fund sufficient in the United States to keep up, within a reasonable limit, the parity of exchange between the peso and the gold dollar of our currency. However, they were compelled so closely to use all of their revenues for the extraordinary expenses in the islands that their exchange has been two or three times exhausted, and is now run down even as low as 16 per cent discount. In fact, exchange between the islands and the United States is practically prohibited. The peso is only worth in American currency 42 cents in the islands.

Mr. WYANT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. WYANT. Is it the purpose to sell these bonds in the United States?

Mr. TOWNER. They will be sold in the United States.

Mr. WYANT. What effect will the sale of these bonds in the United States have directly or indirectly upon Philippine independence?

Mr. TOWNER. It will have no effect.

Mr. WYANT. Why not?

Mr. TOWNER. Everybody there, both those in favor of and those against independence, are in favor of this legislation. The Philippine Legislature, which is for independence, is for this legislation, and it provided before its adjournment for the issuance of $10,000,000 of these bonds which we are now giving them permission to issue. All American interests in the islands and all of those who might be called the opposition to the independence of the islands are in favor of this legislation. There is no division of opinion. Gen. Wood and Gen. Forbes have sent word over urging the immediate passage of this legislation.

Mr. WYANT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. WYANT. A statement has been made with reference to the favorable financial condition of these islands. Why is it that the Philippines are said to be bankrupt, if that is true?

Mr. TOWNER. They are suffering just as every other nation in the world is suffering, just as the United States is suffering, from conditions that exist now. They are suffering from the fact that the government, in order to support its functions, has used current funds rather more than has been justified to support its institutions and prevent a panic. Even if the Filipinos have acted unwisely, if as a matter of fact the present limit of indebtedness is too small, we should enlarge it in justice to them and in justice to ourselves. Then if disaster comes we will not have contributed by our refusal to such a result. In any event, we should do on our part the right and the just thing.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Can the gentleman give us the relation which these thirty millions will bear to the property of the Philippine Islands in comparison with the relation that the fifteen millions bore to the property when it was originally adopted?

UMI

Mr. TOWNER. Yes. The taxable property of the Philippine Islands is probably over a billion pesos, or over $500,000,000 at the present time. Compared with their wealth the amount provided for is small, and, indeed, it is small considered from any possible standpoint.

Mr. STEVENSON. When the $15,000,000 was fixed as the limit, the taxable property was very much less than what it is now, was it not?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Can you give us what it was at that time?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I do not believe I can.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, according to the report, the assessed value of taxable property in the islands at the time of the passage of the act was 555,000,000 pesos; half of that in dollars. Last year the taxable property was 802,000,000 pesos.

Mr. TOWNER. That should have been the year 1919.

Mr. STEVENSON. It is not quite double, then?

Mr. TOWNER. Practically so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is about half; that is, the taxable property?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; and the taxable property value given in 1915 was more nearly the taxable value than that given now.

Mr. STEVENSON. What about the income?

Mr. TOWNER. I have given the income. The revenues of the Philippine government last year were about $42,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand that this is an entirely Philippine proposition?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The credit of the United States is not behind these bonds at all?

Mr. TOWNER. Not at all.

Mr. BLANTON. But the bonds are expected to be sold in the United States?

Mr. TOWNER. I presume so; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman taken into consideration what effect that may have upon the market for our farm loan bonds?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not think it will affect it at all, because the amount is so comparatively small. Fifteen million dollars is but a drop in the bucket compared with the total of tax-exempt bonds in the United States. All municipal bonds are tax exempt. Almost every day there is placed on the market more than is represented here. We shall give at least a little greater care and consideration to these people, representing struggling communities over there, than we should give to established communities in this country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should we?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like the gentleman to yield to me two minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin such time as he may need.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. Has the gentleman from Iowa time to yield, under the rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa has an hour under the rules of the House.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a word about this bill.

Two weeks ago when it was brought up I objected to its consideration on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. I entered that objection because I never, until 10 minutes before the bill was called up, had heard of it and because upon reading it the language presented to me a question too important to be hurriedly considered. I would not, without very serious consideration, vote to permit the raising of the limit for municipal indebtednes in my own State, and much less, I then thought and still think, ought any of us to consent, without proper consideration, to permit the doubling of the debt of a people, helpless and in our power, who live 10,000 miles away.

Since I entered that objection I have consulted with one of the Commissioners from the Philippine Islands and also with the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, Mr. TOWNER, and both of them assure me that it is the wish of the legislative authority in the Philippine Archipelago that this legislation shall be enacted. In view of the assurances of these two distinguished gentlemen and inasmuch as I am in favor of granting complete self-government to the Philippines, and so voted some years ago, I shall not, of course, object to the present consideration of the bill.

I wish, however, in conclusion, to say that were I permitted to make a suggestion to the Filipino people, it would be to remind them that as they wish to be independent the question of the bonded indebtedness of the islands is of tremendous importance to them, and that they ought to be exceedingly watchful not only as to the language in the bonds but also as to who are the holders of the bonds.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make this further statement with regard to the matter: This legislation has been most carefully considered by everyone having an immediate interest in it. The Insular Bureau has made the most careful inquiries regarding the conditions not only over in the Philippine Islands but here in America. The Secretary of War considers that the proposition is an emergency measure and that it is urgent not only that it pass but that it pass as quickly as possible. It has been before the Committee on Insular Affairs and has received their unanimous approval.

I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], the ranking minority member of the Committee on Insular Affairs, five minutes, or such time as he desires.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I really do not know that I have anything to say in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Iowa, Judge TOWNER, unless there be some gentlemen who failed to catch his remarks and who might care to ask me some question about the bill.

As a matter of fact, this bill received very thorough and careful consideration by the Committee on Insular Affairs, both in the last Congress and in the present Congress. A bill similar in character was reported out in the last Congress, but owing to the condition of business it was not reached on the calendar, and early in this session, appreciating the situation which exists in the Philippine Islands, the committee met and considered this bill and reported it out. It was unanimously reported.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am quite in sympathy with the purpose of the bill. I note that there has already been an authorization for a bond issue. Is that by the Legislature of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand that in anticipation of the passage of this act the Philippine Assembly has passed an act authorizing the issue.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I was just wondering if there might not be a reason for placing in this bill some retroactive clause that would cover that authorization. Or is that sufficiently covered?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It was the opinion of the Committee on Insular Affairs—and I may say that so far as I personally was concerned that opinion was derived from the statements made before the committee by Gen. McIntyre and by the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines—that the passage of the act by the Philippine Legislature is entirely sufficient, if this act passes, and that there is no necessity for any other action by Congress than the passage of this act in order to enable them to issue the bonds.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course, the limitation in the act is only a limitation on the indebtedness, and since that indebtedness will accrue until the bonds are issued, I suppose really there would be no need of a retroactive clause covering that authorization.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was the view of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, of the Resident Commissioner, and of the committee.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I think I have nothing further to say about this bill, unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. TOWNER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

MEMORIAL TO AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 112, authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to employees of the United States Department of Agriculture who died in the war with Germany.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] whether this matter has been presented to the Commission on Fine Arts and discussed with them?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under the last three lines of the bill no action can be taken without the advice and recommendation of the Commission of Fine Arts.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I have read the bill and I understand that, but lines 6 and 7 restrict the location to the Mall, between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets SW. The beauty of a memorial may easily be destroyed by being unsuitable for the purpose for which it is intended and it oftentimes happens that a memorial is neither adequate nor suitable to the location selected nor to the subject which it seeks to commemorate. It is proposed to use only $10,000 for this memorial. Another thing, I do not think the Fine Arts Commission should be limited to erecting this memorial between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets SW. If that limitation is stricken out of the bill I shall be favorably disposed toward it.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will notice that in line 5 the permission is for the erection in the grounds of the Department of Agriculture. There was presented to the Committee on the Library a sketch showing the location. If I am rightly informed, it is proposed that in the course of time the brick building which is there shall be removed.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I understand that.

Mr. LUCE. And this memorial will be located with reference to that expectation, in order to be in harmony with the permanent buildings of the department and close to them.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I shall not object, Mr. Speaker, if the Fine Arts Commission is given a free hand.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, along the line suggested by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON] and in accord with the policy adopted in the bill providing for a memorial to be erected to the First Regiment, what is the necessity of designating the site on the Agricultural Department grounds, as specified in the bill in this instance? Why not leave it to the Fine Arts Commission to determine the site on the grounds of the Department of Agriculture, without saying that it shall be on the Mall between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets?

Mr. LUCE. I presume that is put in largely for sentimental purposes. The money for this memorial is contributed by the employees of the Department of Agriculture, and naturally they desire to have the memorial close to the place where they work.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If it was left simply that the memorial be put on the grounds of the Department of Agriculture, it might be put away over in Georgetown where the Weather Bureau, which is a part of the Department of Agriculture, is located. I think it is very properly provided here that it shall be on the grounds between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question whether the Mall should be occupied by monuments. Within two weeks I have noticed a monument on the Mall in the form of a marble vase erected many years ago, the inscriptions obliterated by the elements, and this vase surrounded by an iron or steel fence. It is perfectly out of keeping and out of harmony with the new idea of preserving the Mall without any monuments upon it at all.

If we are going to carry out the ideas of the Fine Arts Commission I think they should be given a free hand to locate these monuments, in conjunction with the Committee on the Library, where they deem proper. I do not think we should designate that it should be placed on the Mall.

Mr. LUCE. It would seem as if that was adequately provided for by the lines on page 2, which provide that the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the Joint Committee on the Library, with the advice and recommendation of the Commission of Fine Arts.

Mr. STAFFORD. But Congress by this bill states that it shall be on the Mall. As I understand the program for the beautification of the Mall it is not intended to have any monuments whatever on the Mall proper. Why not leave the Commission on Fine Arts freedom in locating this monument on the ground of the Agricultural Department, subject to the approval of the Joint Committee on the Library as the proviso states?

Mr. LUCE. So far as we could gather from the expression of opinion of those who were in charge of raising the funds for this memorial, it was the desire that it should be close to the building where the men who gave up their lives had worked.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not see any reason why the gentleman should not take the same position that he did two weeks ago and why he should not be willing to strike out the words "situated in the Mall between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets SW."

Mr. LUCE. The other bill related to a memorial for the First Division of Regulars, who were the first sent abroad. It is not especially appropriate that the memorial to that brigade should be placed in any particular spot, unless it be that the memorial might well be near the building housing the Secretary of War and the Army Department. This memorial is in memory of men who worked in the building of the Agricultural Department, and certainly it is appropriate, natural, and in my mind desirable, that it should be close to the building where they had passed their working hours. It is to be an inspiration to those who continue to work in that building, and it would seem absolutely undesirable that this memorial, probably a fountain, should be placed in any other part of the Mall except close to the building designated.

Mr. STAFFORD. I quite agree with everything the gentleman has said, but the bill as drawn says that the memorial shall be near the building and in the Mall. I have grave objections to having a bill passed by Congress authorizing the erection of a memorial in the Mall proper.

Mr. LUCE. Does not the gentleman notice in the fifth line it says "for the erection in the Department of Agriculture grounds"?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to that language remaining, but my objection is to the language "situated in the Mall between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets SW."

Mr. LUCE. It can not be in the Department of Agriculture grounds, close to this building, unless it is in the Mall.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are plenty of grounds tributary to the building in the Mall. You still leave it to the discretion of the Commission of Fine Arts to locate it in the Mall. Congress has directed that it shall be located in the Mall regardless of the judgment of the Fine Arts Commission.

Mr. LUCE. I can not understand that suggestion in view of the fact that the memorial can not be located near this building without being in the Mall.

Mr. STAFFORD. The different parts of the bill must be construed together. The bill directs that the memorial shall be located in the Mall between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets SW. It is directory to the Commission on Fine Arts, and they are obliged to locate it in the Mall, and in that specific location to that extent their discretion is taken away completely. Unless the gentleman is willing to take the same position that he did two weeks ago, I shall feel constrained to object. I think in harmony with the position taken by the gentleman two weeks ago, the language "situated in the Mall between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets SW." should be eliminated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I want to call attention to the fact that there are a number of bills now pending for a similar purpose. I am in favor of all such bills passing, if the purpose as stipulated in the closing part of this bill and the last similar bill passed is carried out. It says in this bill "and the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of this memorial." I want to call attention to the fact that we provide that the United States Government, with respect to all these memorials, is to be put to no expense concerning erection. But how about the maintenance all through the years that are to come? The gentleman from Massachusetts indicates that this will probably be a fountain. He will remember that until recently we have been appropriating every year $1,200 to maintain what was known as the Dupont Memorial, in Dupont Circle, a memorial to a member of one of the richest families in the United States. After that had been erected it cost the Government $1,200 every year to maintain it. Does not the gentleman believe that this clause should be amended so as to read, "provided that the Government shall be put to no expense concerning erection and maintenance"?

Mr. LUCE. I can hardly conceive it possible that the gentleman should think that in the case of a memorial of this nature, not to cost probably more than $8,000 or $10,000, we should ask the employees of the Agricultural Department to contribute the cost of the water that might run through the drinking fountain.

Mr. BLANTON. If it was only one, two, or three, the Government could maintain them, but I take it that in the coming years there will be numerous organizations building memorials on other parts of Government property and the Government will be called upon to maintain them. If it was of a general character concerning the soldiers or ex-service men who lost their lives in behalf of their country, I would be one of the first to say that the Government should not only build it but should maintain it. But where it is with respect to one particular organization, or one particular group of citizens to build a separate memorial, to be erected and maintained, I do not think it should be done by the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I do not object; I was asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I think I shall have to demand the regular order if some one is going to object, and I assume that some one of these gentlemen who are protesting so much is going to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming calls for the regular order.

Mr. MONDELL. I will withdraw that.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the elimination of the words to which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objects will, in my judgment, have no material effect on the result, and if he prefers to have those words stricken out I shall not insist upon their remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the joint resolution.

House joint resolution 112.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized to grant permission to the Department of Agriculture war memorial committee for the erection in the Department of Agriculture grounds, situated in the Mall, between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets SW., Washington, D. C., of a memorial to the former employees of the said United States Department of Agriculture who lost their lives while in the military or naval service in the war with Germany: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the Joint Committee on the Library, with the advice and recommendations of the Commission of Fine Arts, and the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of this memorial.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in lines 6 and 7, page 1, by striking out the language:

Situated in the Mall, between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets SW.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 6, after the word "grounds," strike out "situated in the Mall between Twelfth and Fourteenth Streets SW."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I voted for the amendment which has just been adopted. I am in favor of memorials to the soldier dead, commemorative of their heroism; but before gentlemen vote to put them here, there, and everywhere in the city of Washington, they should, I think, if they will permit me to offer such a suggestion, make a study of the plan devised by the famous Burnham Commission for the improvement of the city of Washington. During recent years all of the great Government structures—with a few unfortunate disfiguring exceptions—and some important private structures have been located in accordance with that plan. If the plan be carried out—and there is no good reason why it should not—it will in time make Washington incomparably the most beautiful city in the world, as, in my judgment, the Capital of this Nation—the world's greatest example of free government—ought to be.

I am sure that gentlemen who perhaps have not before had this subject brought to their attention will, after studying the plan, agree that it is very important indeed that these memorials be not located haphazard in this city. Gentlemen have seen the magnificent Lincoln Memorial and the work underway on the near-by lagoon. All that is a part of the Burnham plan. And yet it was only after a great struggle on this floor that we succeeded in locating the Lincoln Memorial where it is. What is contemplated is an avenue, 600 feet broad, from the Capitol to the river, with a memorial bridge across to Arlington. Near the foot of Capitol hill stands the impressive monument to Grant, in what is to become Union Square; and experts declare that Union Square, which will be a part of the avenue and occupy the space where now is the little Botanic Garden, will be the finest, the most beautiful square of its size in the world. The visitor standing on the Capitol terrace and looking over Union Square and down the 2 miles of that wonderful tree-bordered avenue will see within it only the towering shaft to George Washington and the superbly beautiful memorial to Abraham Lincoln. On the other side of the river will be Arlington, where sleep in dreamless sleep the Nation's dead. The Capitol, Washington, Lincoln, the Memorial Bridge, Arlington—it is a glorious conception? No other avenue in all the world—no other avenue that can ever be in the world—will mean so much to lovers of liberty. [Applause.]

On the Mall now are temporary structures covering several acres of ground and before long to be torn down. They necessitated the cutting down of many trees. When these buildings are taken away very much of that ground will have been leveled off, so that the expense will be comparatively small to complete the avenue in accordance with the Burnham plan. And, therefore, these soldier memorials, though it is right that they should be erected, should not be put anywhere that this man or that man might wish to see them located, but only in accordance with the splendid plan of the Burnham Commission. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I can assure the gentleman that I conceived it to be one of my first duties as a member of the Committee on the Library to acquaint myself with the Burnham plan. I share completely his admiration for it. I envy the gentleman because he had an opportunity to join in laying the foundations for this great scheme, and if I in my turn may have the opportunity to share in building on those foundations I shall, indeed, be grateful. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LUCE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

CAMP EUSTIS, VA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 138, to repeal so much of the act of Congress approved February 28, 1920, as provides for Camp Eustis, Va.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would inquire whether the War Department, in this measure which seeks to continue a military camp which has heretofore been recommended for discontinuance by Congress, has reported upon the measure and approves of it.

Mr. McKENZIE. It has.

Mr. STAFFORD. No such recommendation is found in the report of the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee, Mr. KAHN, has been called away. He wrote the report of the committee, and I presume he expected to explain the matter in detail. However, Secretary Weeks has written a very strong letter to me, and I presume to other members of the Committee on Military Affairs, urging that this resolution be enacted into law and that Camp Eustis be retained.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then will the gentleman incorporate that letter in the RECORD, so that Members of the House may have the benefit of it in considering this resolution whenever it comes up again—say, two weeks hence?

Mr. McKENZIE. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will not object, because on the 30th of June the time limit for the retention of Camp Eustis expires. This is a matter of business policy for the Government. This is a matter of real consequence, and I hope the gentleman will not object when we are taking up so much time of the House considering matters of very little importance.

Mr. STAFFORD. I read the report carefully and noticed the recommendation of the committee was based on the one idea that this camp is to be utilized and is valuable for the development of heavy railway artillery. Have we not a very large camp at Aberdeen, Md., which is utilized for the same purpose by the Army?

Mr. McKENZIE. We have not.

Mr. STAFFORD. When I was over there some years back, during the war, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, actual demonstrations were being made of artillery mounted on railways, and the grounds there certainly were ample enough.

Mr. McKENZIE. In reply to that I would state that you might have an exhibition of firing railroad artillery anywhere in the country, but that does not involve the question of the best place to have your camp situated for the purpose of training your artillerymen who are going to operate the field artillery.

Mr. STAFFORD. When I read this bill it seemed to me that this was a military policy of the Military Affairs Committee rather than a military policy of the War Department. Until something is presented definitely showing the reasons why the War Department wishes more camps after the Congress has adopted the policy of discontinuing camps in its plan of economy, I will feel constrained to object.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman reserve it for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to having it go over without prejudice.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] would only contain himself to permit us to get this bill up for consideration, I think we could even satisfy so critical a gentleman as the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the reservation of objection, I have no objection to the letter of the Secretary being read for information.

Mr. McKENZIE. I happen to be a member of the committee that is taking an invoice of all the real estate belonging to the Military Establishment, and we hope to dispose of a great deal of it. But as one member of that committee I do feel that we have a right to exercise our judgment in recommending the disposal of certain tracts and properties belonging to the War Department and the retention of others, especially of those tracts which our ordinary common sense tells us it would be economy for the Government to retain.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to reserving the objection so that the gentleman can have read the letter of the Secretary of War.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not know that I have that with me.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me there is no special object in spending much time on this bill if objection is to be made. And I hope in the near future that we will have an opportunity to consider this and another bill which has been reported, a general bill, from the Committee on Military Affairs. And if objection is to be made, we are taking up time uselessly, it seems to me.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] withhold his objection?

Mr. MONDELL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. About five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not made the objection. But if it is to be made, there is no object in discussing the matter now.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. The situation is this, and I think a short statement would probably satisfy the gentleman from Wisconsin as to the importance of this measure and action on it at this time: A bill has been passed which expressly provides that the Secretary of War shall sell Camp Eustis. As the bill passed the House it provided for sale without limitation. Then when the bill went to the Senate there was a proviso attached to that bill to the effect that such sale should not occur before June 30, 1921. So the necessity for passing upon this bill at this time arises because of the express mandate of the bill that was passed in February, 1920.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I ask the gentleman in that particular whether there is anything in the act of February 28, 1920, that compels the Secretary of War to sell this ground before July 1 of this year?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. The act expressly provides that the Secretary of War shall make sale of the property at Camp Eustis.

Mr. STAFFORD. But there is no mandatory direction that compels him to sell the property before July 1?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. On the other hand, the direction is to sell, but the limitation against sale expires on June 30, 1921. The express mandate of the statute is for sale.

Mr. STAFFORD. Unless the gentleman wishes to move to have the bill passed over without prejudice, I will have to object.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I shall not ask for any such thing.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we hope to have this measure and a general measure providing for some of these camps considered in the near future.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

CADETS AT UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1358) to provide for maintaining the Corps of Cadets at the United States Military Academy at its maximum authorized strength, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it does not seem to me that under the conditions that now exist there is any necessity for the passage of this act designed to increase considerably the number of Army officers.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. May I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection to that? There is nothing more necessary than this bill, and I think I can explain it satisfactorily.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, we have a provision now for 1,300 men at West Point. We do not ask to have any more, but we have got a very much less number, namely, 919. The reason we have so much fewer there is that the men do not pass their examination in certain districts in certain States. It is very essential that the Point should be full. We need the officers in our Army.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is just the point. I suppose the Army will be reduced by the end of the next fiscal year to 150,000, in accordance with the action taken by the House a few days ago. I have an idea that the sentiment of this country is going to insist, unless some emergency arises, upon its being reduced still further next year, and kept at a pretty low number. And I have the impression that we are top-heavy with officers now, and that is one of the troubles.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will say to the gentleman we still need more educated officers in civil life.

The Civil War was fought, as the Mexican War was fought, by Grant and McClellan and Sherman, and Jackson on the other side, West Pointers who had gone into civil life, and who came back from that life and made the best officers. The education of officers is the first thing for the defense of this country. I now see the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] in the Chamber. I did not know that he was here. He is in charge of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. In a moment. This bill does not provide that West Point shall be any larger than is now provided by law. What this bill does is this: If in a State there are, say, 10 men to be appointed and in 6 districts there are 6 men who get in as principals and there are several alternates that qualify and in other districts none of the principals or alternates qualify, it allows the alternates who have qualified in one district in that State to be qualified in the other districts, so that they are entered in there, but without taking away the right of a Congressman to appoint next time, next year, just as he does now, because there are always more who drop out during the term and make vacancies than will provide for that. Then this bill goes on a little further. If after you have used all the men who have qualified in that State, there are still vacancies in appointments from that State, men who have qualified from other States as alternates may be put under competitive examination, and the best of them taken into West Point to fill those vacancies.

Even with all this, they do not expect to get within two or three hundred of the full 1,300 cadets now provided for at West Point. But every additional member costs less than the ones that were there before, because the overhead charges have to be paid anyhow, and by having a West Point that is full it costs less for each cadet, and in the meanwhile we are giving the country the benefit of a military education.

I hope they will not all go into the Army. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. I have always insisted that the policy pursued in 1815 was the right policy. At that time we enlarged the number of cadets at West Point to 250 members. We had then only 5,000 men in the Army. Two-thirds of those who were educated at West Point went into civil life. We had then less than 10,000,000 population, and if we had a proportionate number of cadets at West Point now to what we had then we would have to have an academy of 2,500 instead of 1,300.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will not permit a question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will permit a question. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The time to yield is passed.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I did not intend any discourtesy to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] objects.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill retains its place on the calendar.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to its being passed over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

APPORTIONMENT OF THE WATERS OF THE COLORADO RIVER.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the rules be suspended and that we pass the bill, H. R. 6877.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the rules be suspended and that the bill, H. R. 6877, be passed. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the bill by title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6877) to permit a compact or agreement between the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming, respecting the disposition and apportionment of the waters of the Colorado River, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a second.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill has not been reported yet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Colorado River and its several tributaries rise within and flow through or from the boundaries between the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming; and

Whereas the territory included within the drainage area of the said stream and its tributaries is largely arid and in small part irrigated, and the present and future development necessities and general welfare of said States and of the United States require the further use of the waters of said streams for irrigation and other beneficial purposes, and that future litigation and conflict respecting the use and distribution of said waters should be avoided and settled by compact between said States; and

Whereas the said States, by appropriate legislation, have authorized the governors thereof to appoint commissioners to represent said States for the purpose of entering into a compact or agreement between said States respecting the future utilization and disposition of the waters of the Colorado River and of the streams tributary thereto; and

Whereas the governors of said several States have named and appointed their respective commissioners for the purposes aforesaid, and have presented their resolution to the President of the United States requesting the appointment of a representative on behalf of the United States to participate in said negotiations and to represent the interests of the United States: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That consent of Congress is hereby given to the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact or agreement not later than January 1, 1923, providing for an equitable division and apportionment among said States of the water supply of the Colorado River and of the streams tributary thereto, upon condition that a suitable person, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, shall participate in said negotiations, as the representative of and for the protection of the interests of the United States, and shall make report to Congress of the proceedings and of any compact or agreement entered into, and the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated to pay the salary and expenses of the representative of the United States appointed hereunder: Provided, That any such compact or agreement shall not be binding or obligatory upon any of the parties thereto unless and until the same shall have been approved by the legislature of each of said States and by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is herewith expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] demands a second.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN], a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, may have control of the time on this side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri will be entitled to 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN] to 20 minutes. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. I yield five minutes to him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the Colorado River flows through or is a part of the boundary of the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming. It lies wholly in the arid region, and the waters of the river or its tributaries have been used to a greater or lesser extent for irrigation purposes in all of the States named. Eventually the waters of the river will be used to a much greater extent for irrigation purposes than heretofore, and it has been deemed wise to secure at an early date if possible an agreement among the States affected relative to an equitable distribution of the water among them. Each of the States has passed practically identical legislation providing for a joint conference, and I think all of the States have appointed commissioners.

This bill first authorizes or gives the consent of the Congress to negotiations on the part of the States, and in order that the interests of the United States may be guarded, provides for a commissioner to represent the United States. After an agreement is reached the commissioner will of course report to Congress, and it will then be for Congress to say whether or no assent should be given to the adoption of the agreement by the States interested.

That is about all that I care to say, Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman desires to ask me questions with regard to the legislation.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Is it the gentleman's opinion that this will be completed within the year?

Mr. MONDELL. It is my hope that it will be completed this summer.

Mr. MICHENER. Can the gentleman, from his knowledge of the matter, give the House any assurance that we will not be asked next year to appropriate an additional sum for the purpose of continuing this commission?

Mr. MONDELL. I can assure the gentleman that all of the people interested in all of the seven States are hopeful and anxious that an agreement be reached this summer. It is highly important that it should be. It is not to the interest of anyone that the proceedings be delayed. It is to the interest of all to have the matter disposed of speedily. I hope that if this bill passes at an early date the conference may be held and the agreement reached before the December session.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The bill carries an appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. MONDELL. It authorizes an appropriation.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. It authorizes an appropriation of $10,000, to be taken care of, of course, by the Committee on Appropriations, for the person who is to sit in on this transaction for the Government. I notice in the report it is stated that that is the difference between this bill and other similar bills, that the Government has not heretofore had persons to represent it in matters of this kind. Why do you provide this $10,000? Why can not the Department of the Interior designate a person to go out and look after this for the Government on the salary that he now receives?

Mr. MONDELL. No agreement of this kind has ever been entered into. The States have been authorized to conduct negotiations with regard to boundaries and fisheries and matters of that sort, but they were not matters in which the Federal Government had any special interest.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Would not a matter of this kind properly come under the Land Office in the Department of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. It might; and it would be within the power of the President to appoint some one connected with the public service, although in that event, of course, they could not draw additional compensation.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I know; but they could draw the compensation that they now draw and have their expenses defrayed by the Government, could they not, and save this $10,000, or a good portion of it?

Mr. MONDELL. Not a penny of this money will be spent, I will say to my friend, except on an appropriation recommended by the Appropriations Committee after a full hearing of the matter.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understand that.

Mr. MONDELL. As the Government has important interests to guard, it is desirable that there be a representative of the Government. There will probably be some expenditures in connection with the holding of the conference, but no expenditure can be made except on an appropriation.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understand that very well, but the appropriation will come afterwards.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it the gentleman's idea that the Government should not spend a few dollars in a matter of this kind, however important it may be to the Government?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Not at all. The gentleman's idea is that there are very competent men in the Land Office to-day, in the Department of the Interior, who know more about this project perhaps than any man you could designate to go out there unless you got a man of that character. The thing I want to know of the gentleman is, why not send a man of that character out there, and not pick up some fellow somewhere else whom the President may want to send?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman whom the gentleman from Texas is addressing will not have anything to say about who shall be sent. The President can appoint whomsoever he sees fit.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Then why not omit the $10,000 and let the President appoint some one who is now on the rolls?

Mr. MONDELL. There are certain to be some expenditures, and while we are economizing, we have not quite reached the point where we can not spend a few dollars to take care of the important business of the Government.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I will state for the benefit of the gentleman from Texas and other Members that this matter has been submitted to the Interior Department by the Committee on the Judiciary, and there is no objection there.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It will make a good job for somebody.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I do not object to any necessary expenditure, but my idea is that some one who is familiar with this matter and who is an expert on these questions who is already in the employ of the Interior Department could be sent to represent the Government.

Mr. DYER. We feel that the method provided in this bill is the better one.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I am not disputing that the gentleman may think so, but the question is, Do we think it is the better way? Have you consulted the taxpayers of the country to see whether they consider it the better way?

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman from Arkansas use some of his time?

Mr. TILLMAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, this matter was recently considered at Denver, Colo., at a conference of the governors of the Western States affected by this bill, at which time resolutions were passed requesting Congress to pass legislation of this character. The legislatures of all the States concerned have passed the necessary laws authorizing the appointment of commissioners on behalf of the States, and to complete the organization there should be a commissioner appointed by the President to represent the United States, because the Colorado River is a navigable stream, interstate and international in character, and Federal interests are therefore involved.

My first impression was that no action by Congress was necessary, but that the irrigation development along the Colorado River might proceed as had been done on other streams, and inasmuch as the principal use of its waters must of necessity be along the lower reaches of the river in Arizona and California I could see no particular need for an agreement with the upstream States. But the more I studied the question the more certain I became that this legislation should be passed. I found that there had been serious controversies between other States similarly situated; for instance, the famous case between Kansas and Colorado, which went to the Supreme Court of the United States, to settle a dispute over the waters of the Arkansas River, and a like disagreement between the States of Wyoming and Nebraska over the waters of the North Platte.

I recently conferred with the Director of the United States Reclamation Service relative to this matter and left with him a newspaper article which expressed some opposition to this bill. Mr. Davis has written to me as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., July 11, 1921.

Hon. CARL HAYDEN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAYDEN: I have examined the clipping from the Mohave County Miner which you handed me and the House bill intended to cover the subject of providing for an equitable division and apportionment of the water supply of the Colorado River and its tributaries.

I do not share in the apprehensions of the Mohave County Miner and believe the proper arrangement could be reached by some kind of diplomatic procedure. I think that any arrangement entered into by agreement with all the States would be safe, because under the State laws this arrangement would be subject to ratification by the State legislature, and would be invalid unless so ratified. The question is largely one of psychology, upon which you are perhaps a better judge than I, but I should be inclined to favor some diplomatic arrangement between the States.

Very truly, yours, A. P. DAVIS, Director.

If the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming can agree upon an equitable division of the waters of the Colorado River, and that agreement is ratified by Congress, it is certain that much litigation will be obviated. There will be no cause for an appeal to the courts because the matter will be determined in advance in a way that will avoid great expense and loss of time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman or the committee considered the possibility of a complaint being made by the Government of Mexico unless that Republic is authorized to enter into negotiations in regard to a stream running into Mexico?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Federal Government is the only party that could agree with Mexico and any representation made by the Mexican Government could be transmitted by the State Department for consideration by the Federal representative who will be appointed if this bill is passed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Any agreement between the two countries would have to be ratified.

Mr. HAYDEN. If it is found to be necessary to give consideration to any claim made by Mexico for a share of the waters of the Colorado the commissioner authorized to be appointed by this bill as the representative of the United States would be better qualified to advise the State Department than anyone else whenever diplomatic negotiations with Mexico are undertaken.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As the gentleman from Wyoming suggests, this committee will secure the information and the United States will know precisely what, if any, claims are made by Mexico.

Mr. HAYDEN. In an opinion rendered by Judson Harmon, Attorney General of the United States, on December 12, 1895, in the Rio Grande case it was held that a diversion of water for irrigation in the United States can not be the cause of a complaint by the Republic of Mexico to which serious consideration need be given by the United States. If there is a place in the United States where the waters of an international stream can be beneficially used for irrigation and a diversion is actually made, Mexico has no rights other than those which the United States may voluntarily grant. In that opinion the Attorney General said:

The fundamental principle of international law is the absolute sovereignty of every nation as against all others within its own territory. Of the nature and scope of sovereignty with respect to judicial jurisdiction, which is one of its elements, Chief Justice Marshall said (Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 7 Cranch, p. 136):

"The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself. Any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty to the same extent in that power which could impose such restriction.

"All exceptions, therefore, to the full and complete power of a nation within its own territories must be traced up to the consent of the nation itself. They can flow from no other legitimate source."

It would be entirely useless to multiply authorities. So strongly is the principle of general and absolute sovereignty maintained that it has even been asserted by high authority that admitted international servitudes cease when they conflict with the necessities of the servient State. (Bluntschli, p. 212; see criticism by Creasy, p. 258.) Whether this be true or not, its assertion serves to emphasize the truth that self-preservation is one of the first laws of nations. No believer in the doctrine of natural servitudes has ever suggested one which would interfere with the enjoyment by a nation within its own territory of whatever was necessary to the development of its resources or the comfort of its people.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to my good friend from Nevada.

Mr. ARENTZ. Is it the gentleman's idea that a commission might be appointed later on to investigate the international conditions on the Colorado River and that the commission mentioned in this bill will do nothing more than to get data?

Mr. HAYDEN. If that should be found necessary.

Mr. ARENTZ. Does not the gentleman think that it should be done now, and could not this commission's powers be enlarged so as to take that in?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am decidedly not in favor of enacting any legislation by Congress containing an acknowledgment that the Republic of Mexico has any rights whatever in the waters of the Colorado River. If anything of that kind is done, it should be accomplished through diplomatic channels by a treaty with Mexico to be negotiated by the Secretary of State and ratified by the Senate.

In conclusion, let me express the hope that none of the States mentioned in this bill will adopt a dog-in-the-manger attitude, but that broad-minded men, experienced in irrigation development, will be appointed as commissioners and that they will promptly reach a fair and just agreement. When fully conserved there is water enough in the Colorado River to fully reclaim at least 6,000,000 acres of the most fertile land on this continent, located in a region blessed with more sunshine and a longer growing season than can be found anywhere. We are taking a legislative step to-day toward the creation of an irrigated empire which will yield untold agricultural wealth to the American people.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose there is a man in the House opposing the intent and purpose of this bill to permit these States to properly adjust this water supply. All of us are in favor of it, but it is getting so that we can not pass hardly a week in Congress without appointing some man to a new high-salaried position. It is this feature to which I object. Such appointment is unnecessary. The Secretary of the Interior could act. If it is necessary to appoint a man to be designated by the President to attend to this work, why should he receive a salary any higher than you receive or that which a United States Senator receives? Why should he receive a salary of $10,000?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. There is nothing in this bill fixing the salary of the man to be appointed. There is a maximum of $10,000 for all expenses connected with the negotiations on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The Committee on Appropriations will be called upon to determine what is the value of the services rendered.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Wyoming knows as well as I do that after we pass this measure the President down in the White House can designate some good friend of ours out in Wyoming, some constituent of the leader of the House, to act for the Federal Government; and when the President notifies us that he has done that you will find the Appropriations Committee come in and back him up, because we always back him up. If he sould notify us that he had appointed a man at the salary of $10,000 authorized by this measure I would vote myself to pay the bill, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not want the gentleman from Texas to get the impression that the gentleman from Wyoming has any candidate or has the slightest notion that anybody among his constituents could be appointed.

Mr. BLANTON. No; but I feel satisfied that the constituents of the gentleman from Wyoming are just as hungry for $10,000 jobs as the constituents of any other Member of the House. I was giving them credit for that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Texas see any reason why the constituents of the gentleman from Wyoming could not legitimately aspire to this new place?

Mr. BLANTON. No; because he would have an enthusiastic and able advocate at court to speak in his behalf when he put in the application.

Mr. Speaker, if I could offer an amendment to the bill I would move to strike this high-salaried appointment provision out, but when the gentleman from Wyoming, the leader of this House, proposed to pass this measure under suspension of the rules he knew that we could not amend it, as no amendment is in order, and he knew that there was no chance to strike out the $10,000 position from the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. I am going to ask unanimous consent and then I will yield. Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the House I ask unanimous consent that the following amendment, striking out this high-salaried appointment, and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to act for us, which I send to the desk, may be considered in order on this bill. Then I want to see whether or not the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming will give us a chance under the rules to vote on whether or not we will call on the Secretary of the Interior to pass on this matter or whether he will insist that we will employ a man at a salary of $10,000 a year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that an amendment which he sends to the desk may be considered. Is there objection?

Mr. VARE. I object.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. As I introduced the bill it carried no authorization whatever. I was informed, both by the members of the committee and by the department of the Government interested in having the matter carefully considered, that there should be a provision for an appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the gentleman did not have it in the bill when he introduced it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Arkansas please let me have a little more time?

Mr. TILLMAN. My time has all been apportioned.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Missouri give me one minute? I yielded most of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] knows that he can arrange matters afterwards as well as beforehand, as, for instance, the time he used his snickersnee in the committee to cut the surveyors general out of a bill, and after they were cut off came back in on the floor of the House and put every last one of them back into the bill by his persuasive powers. All of that money has been paid out of the Treasury since. It is these $10,000 a year jobs that I am going to vote against, and I am going to vote against this bill because of that one fact, if I am the only man on the floor of the House who does it. We ought to stop creating these high-salaried positions. You ought to begin the economy that you preach every day, and which you are pledged to the people of the United States to bring about.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the purpose of this bill is and should be apparent to Members if they will look to the report and the bill and if they are familiar with the conditions of the Colorado River as it affects the States named in the bill, namely, Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming. It will permit these States to settle this water difficulty and present it to Congress for approval. The upper reaches of the Colorado River affect these States and then flow down through Colorado, California, on to Lower California, the Gulf of Lower California, and then into the Pacific Ocean. Considerable litigation has grown up over the water of the Colorado River. Considerable retarding of the development of the States mentioned has been occasioned by virtue of the litigation regarding the waters of the Colorado River. One of the main features now is relative to the division of the water as between the United States, or the States bordering on the Colorado River, and those through which it flows, including California, Colorado, Arizona, and New Mexico, and Mexico. Many hundreds of thousands of acres of land to-day lie idle, unirrigated, with the waters running to the sea, because there has been no adjustment of the water rights as between the United States and Lower California—Mexico. I spent two days last year in Lower California with a committee of the chambers of commerce of the Imperial Valley, who met the governor of Lower California, Mexico, and went over this situation clear down into Lower California. Those in the Chicawalla Valley and the Palasedo and others are desirous of obtaining these waters and those farther toward the headwaters of the river.

Further there is a question as to where you may use the waters, because the decisions of the Supreme Court as to the State wherein they arise. That brings about a complication, that by virtue of the States named, through their sovereign power and their official head, the governor and the legislature, a commission has been appointed in each of the States, so that the duly delegated commissioners may meet in joint meeting and determine in respect to the divisibility and the division of the waters of the Colorado River.

One of the most important things in the bill is to allow the President to appoint a representative of the Government of the United States. It should be remembered that in all of these States there is public land and the Government of the United States is a riparian owner in the waters of many of these streams in all of the States, as well as in the waters as they finally flow on into the Gulf of California. The Federal Government at all hazards should have a representative to sit in with these commissioners from these States, to the end that a clear, intelligent report might be made to Congress. If the Federal agent or representative of the President can agree, then the report can be sent to Congress so that, if it is satisfactory, it may be approved once and for all and this whole question settled. When that has been done it will be easy because we will have united action as to what can be done with the water, to enter into negotiations with Mexico and get this question adjusted as it ought to be at an early date.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. The United States is just as much interested in the division of this water as any of the States or all of them.

Mr. RAKER. I believe the Government of the United States to-day is interested more than any of the States, because on all of these streams toward the headwaters the Government owns the public lands and is a riparian owner in the waters.

Mr. BARBOUR. Can the gentleman state to the House whether these States have provided in the laws passed by the various legislatures for the payment of the expenses of their various commissions?

Mr. RAKER. I think so.

Mr. DYER. They have.

Mr. MONDELL. They have.

Mr. BARBOUR. Then that is an answer to the argument made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The purpose of this bill is to permit the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming to enter into an agreement for the equitable division and apportionment of the water supply of the Colorado River. The necessity for this grows out of the possibility of conflict in the diversion and use of the waters of the Colorado River in the various States through which the river and its tributaries flow. Without an agreement between the States interested respecting the division and apportionment of the waters for irrigation purposes, conflicts as to the amount of water which may be diverted on the various portions of the river and its tributaries, without interference with diversion and use elsewhere, are certain to occur and to lead to expensive litigation, in the meanwhile holding up and preventing development. Most irrigation projects on the Colorado River and its tributaries involve large expenditures, and complete or even considerably further development can not be had or secured without an agreement under which development can be carried on without conflict and litigation.

In view of this condition the States named have passed similar legislation under which commissioners have been appointed to represent them in negotiating some agreement for the solution of this difficulty. Considering the interests of the United States in this water supply, these statutes authorize and provide for participation on the part of the Government in these negotiations, so as to give to the United States an opportunity to protect its interests. Hence a provision is made in this bill authorizing the President to appoint some suitable person to represent the National Government, but this representative is not given power to bind the Government. It is evident that it would be an advantage to have a person present at the negotiations between the States.

In such negotiations the need for water in any locality, the supply available as well as other factors, must be discussed, with their bearing upon any interests the United States may have in the matter, and his presence at the negotiations will naturally aid in composing the differences that may arise between the various States in adjusting their different claims. His report of the negotiations and of the contract entered into will assist Congress in determining whether such contract should be finally approved by Congress.

Legislation is necessary, because under the Constitution a State can not enter into any covenant or agreement with another State without the consent of Congress. The Congress has on many occasions given its consent to such covenants or agreements between different States. This bill differs from the ordinary like legislation only in that the Government of the United States is to participate in the negotiations, that being necessary because of its interest in the controversy.

It was not deemed wise to simply authorize the States to enter into a contract. It was believed that Congress should have the exact terms of the contract before it finally approved it. For that reason whatever contract is finally entered into must be submitted to Congress for its approval.

There is no question of navigation or water power involved in the legislation. The part of the river affected by this bill is not navigable in fact, and the question of water power is so largely of a local character that it would hardly be considered within the scope of such a contract. If the agreement should involve either of those questions, that matter would properly be considered when an agreement is submitted for approval by Congress.

This measure will very greatly aid in the development of the States affected.

Mr. RAKER. While the gentleman from Texas makes some statements at times that are good, the statement he makes this time is not involved in the matter at all. When all of the States having interests involving many millions of dollars are ready and willing to pay their part for the purpose of protecting their interests and their citizens, then the Government of the United States should not hesitate and should not be small enough or picayunish enough or should not play peanut politics sufficient to prevent the President from appointing a competent man to represent the Government at this meeting, and this Congress should provide the means whereby the interest of the United States Government shall be protected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not the Secretary of the Interior just such a man for just such a purpose, and do we not pay him now a salary of $12,000 a year?

Mr. RAKER. But the Secretary of the Interior has all that he can attend to. Let us appoint a man, if it does cost a few dollars, to look after our interests.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What about Brig. Gen. Dr. Sawyer? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. I prefer not to answer that question at this time, although, of course, it is a pertinent one. But I would say in that connection that for this particular job undoubtedly the President will appoint an engineer who has had experience in the Reclamation Service for 10 or 15 years and who understands the rights of the Government, and therefore will be in a position to do the work.

Mr. MADDEN. Would not the gentleman from California who has the floor just now be a good man?

Mr. RAKER. I am not a civil engineer, and then again——

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman knows all these things very well.

Mr. RAKER. I know from first-hand information that this kind of legislation is right. Even if the President of the United States happens to be a Republican, I believe in upholding his hands and passing legislation that will protect our Government. That is my attitude. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time, or so much as the gentleman may desire, to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, the House has passed a number of bills very similar to this. The Constitution provides that the States can not enter into agreements one with the other without the consent of the Congress, and the object in coming to Congress for this legislation is to comply with that constitutional provision. We have a precedent in a case very much like this one, where the Government appointed a person to act for the National Government. When the bill came to the committee we considered it very carefully, and it was apparent to us that it was proper and necessary to have the Government represented. I think that my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] ought not to object to paying for his services, because that man, while he may aid the States, has a more important function, that of protecting the rights of the United States. Our Government has a good deal of interest in this stream, as it is the chief source of water for irrigation in the States affected. We ought to have some one for the purpose of seeing that none of our public lands are unfairly dealt with. And in addition to that he ought to be there because there is an international feature connected with this matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman believe that the Secretary of the Interior could send a man out there who will know more about it when he goes out there than this new commissioner, at $10,000 a year, will ever learn?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just a minute. It may be true that the Secretary can select a man of that kind. Whether he could get one inside of the department who would be fair under the circumstances I do not know. Whether appointed from inside or outside of that department, there is nothing in the bill that calls for paying him $10,000, or anything like that sum. Whatever is necessary we ought to pay, because the gentleman will have to look after the interests of the United States and protect its interests. We certainly should not ask the States to pay the one who represents the National Government.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to use any further time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that in the opinion of the Chair two-thirds had voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 5.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas objects to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present, and it is evident there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. Those in favor of suspending the rules and passing the bill will, as their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 237, nays 15, answered "present" 2, not voting 176, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

CENTENNIAL OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF PERU.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate joint resolution 34.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend the rules and pass Senate joint resolution 34. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 34) creating a commission to represent the United States in the celebration of the first centennial of the proclamation of the independence of the Republic of Peru.

Resolved, etc., That a commission is hereby created, consisting of six members and a secretary, to be appointed by the President of the United States, to represent the United States in the celebration of the first centennial of the proclamation of the independence of the Republic of Peru in said Republic during the month of July, 1921.

That to meet the expenses of the commission the sum of $15,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended at the discretion of the Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I care to demand a second.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. FLOOD. Then I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia demands a second.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman from Virginia against the bill?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. BLANTON. I am. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas, who is opposed to the bill, is recognized to demand a second.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to 20 minutes. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is entitled to 20 minutes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, this measure has been recommended by President Wilson and President Harding and by the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes. I ask that the Clerk read those letters out of my time. They are attached to the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the correspondence will be read in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State recommending the resubmission to the present Congress of the invitation from the Government of Peru for participation by the Government of the United States in the ceremonies incident to the celebration of the first centennial of the proclamation of the independence of Peru which are to take place at Lima in July next.

The matter was presented to the Sixty-sixth Congress by my predecessor, whose message on the subject and the accompanying report of the then Secretary of State are contained in Senate Document No. 370, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, a copy of which I attach hereto.

As pointed out by the present Secretary of State in his accompanying recommendation, the cordial relations which have always existed between the United States and Peru and the equality of treatment which we desire to accord to all the American Republics alike would seem to emphasize the importance of Congress making provision for a no less imposing participation by the United States in the Peruvian celebration than it had in similar celebrations of other Latin-American countries. I have, therefore, no hesitation in adding my own commendation of the matter to that of my predecessor and in recommending to the Congress the passage of the joint resolution he transmitted.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 14, 1921.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President a copy of Senate Document No. 370, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, containing a message from President Wilson commending to the favorable consideration of Congress the passage of a joint resolution to create a commission to represent the United States in the celebration, in July, 1921, of the first centennial of the proclamation of the independence of Peru, and to provide for the expenses of the commission, as well as a report by the then Secretary of State presenting reasons why, in his judgment, fitting representation by the United States in the celebration was advisable. Probably due to the pressure of business upon it during the last month of its session and the advanced stage of the regular appropriation bills, no action was taken by the last Congress on the recommendation.

The undersigned Secretary of State deems representation by the United States at the Peruvian celebration, in keeping with its representation at similar celebrations of other Latin-American countries, advisable; and, believing such representation desirable and important not only as evidencing a no less cordial friendship for Peru but as being consistent as well with that impartiality and equality of treatment which it is desired should characterize the policy of this Government in its relations with the American Republics, he heartily recommends the submission of the matter anew to the present Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April —, 1921.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the translation of the letter of the Peruvian Minister of Exterior Relations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Translation.]

LIMA, October 30, 1920.

MR. SECRETARY: On July 28, 1921, Peru will celebrate the first centennial of the proclamation of her independence by the illustrious Argentine, Gen. don José de San Martin, which marked the ending of the colonial rule, and our entering the family of sovereign and free nations. During the century that has gone by the nation has strained its energies in the direction of constituting a democratic foundation of a government which, while guarding the law and right, would promote the development of the great national resources seeking the expansion of its industries and commerce, internal and external, and establish with the other countries permanent ties of brotherhood and peace.

At the close of this century stage of the indefatigable although hardly begun exertion the Government of Peru would be highly pleased if the other friendly Governments, whose valued relations it always jealously cultivated, and whose cooperation exercises great influence on the progress of our nation, would join in its rejoicing.

With that end in view, I have been instructed by the President of the Republic to extend a special invitation to the Government of the United States of America to be officially represented at the ceremonies that will take place in this capital from the 24th to the 31st of July of the coming year, which invitation I have the honor, formally, to present in this communication.

In order to take adequate measures for the housing and the attentions due to the representatives whom the Government of your excellency will, no doubt, be pleased to send, I shall be thankful if it will, at the earliest convenience, deign to favor me with the names of all the persons that it may see fit to designate.

I take pleasure in offering to your excellency the assurances of my highest and most distinguished consideration.

A. SALOMÓN,
Minister of Exterior Relations.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I assume that the gentleman who demanded a second desires some time.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania gets through I desire some time.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves the remainder of his time. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, ordinarily no Member of Congress would object to a resolution of this kind—to appoint a commission from our Government to participate in such a centennial celebration. The fact that it is a small country like Peru would not cut any figure in the matter at all. It is proper that our Government——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Peru is not a small country, the gentleman should understand.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, it is not as big as Great Britain, or Japan, or Russia, or America.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But it is very important to the United States in a commercial sense, and it is quite as large, if not larger, in the business it does with the United States than many other countries.

Mr. BLANTON. I was speaking only of its size or importance as one of the world powers, compared with the larger countries, when I spoke of it as "a small country." It is a small country, is it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It certainly is not in relation to its business with the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. That may be. But my remark would apply just the same. I repeat again, for the benefit of my excellent friend from Washington, that ordinarily no one could object to this kind of a resolution. But those things we would readily do ordinarily in normal peace times we must be a little careful about just now.

When an individual gets deeply in debt and can not make ends meet, when his income is not sufficient to pay the necessary expenses that must come out of his pocket, he can not sometimes go to wedding ceremonies of members close to him; he can not take the usual trips in the summer time.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Or sometimes when a member of his family dies, even he can not go to the funeral. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. He has to watch himself. The murmurs I hear in the rear benches do not disturb me a bit. I have been out on the prairies of Texas where I have heard coyotes howl at night, and they did not bother me at all. [Applause.]

I am going to speak now on the question of economy. That is more than lip deep with me every day that we meet in this House. If it is necessary for individuals under extraordinary circumstances and on extraordinary occasions to economize on every single point, it is necessary not only for this Nation but for every single nation in the world just now. [Applause.] We have to pass up some ceremonies individually, and the Nation must pass up some ceremonies that mean expense to the people, the same as in the case of individuals and families. We hear economy preached here on the floor every day, and we hear what we have done in this respect and in that respect; yet we have not done a thing that I know of that stops the everlasting expense that is draining us forever and that is continually coming out of the Treasury. It has not been but a very few weeks since by your votes you increased the salary of the Assistant Secretary of War, who all of these years has been drawing $5,000. Yet you increased it to $10,000, or $2,500 a year more than any United States Senator gets, if you please. It has not been many weeks since this House by an almost unanimous vote created a new position for a politician in Ohio, Mr. Brown, at $7,500 per annum, to come in and advise a committee of Congressmen and Senators on reorganization. Just the other day you created the new office of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury at $10,000 per year, and then you created the new office of Undersecretary of the Treasury at $10,000 per year.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. I should like to ask the gentleman two very short questions. Suppose we should deny this appropriation, does the gentleman think that would stop the centennial celebration in Peru?

Mr. BLANTON. No.

Mr. BEGG. Does he think it would stop the other nations sending their representatives?

Mr. BLANTON. No.

Mr. BEGG. All right. If we can not stop the centennial celebration there, and if the other nations are going to be represented, would the gentleman have the United States stay away?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. On the ground of poverty?

Mr. BEGG. On the ground that we could not afford the $10,000?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman's question shows that he has not studied the bill as he usually studies these questions.

Mr. BEGG. I will say to the gentleman that I was on the committee that reported out the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. It shows just how little the gentleman on the committee knows about his bill, because the bill appropriates $15,000 instead of $10,000. [Laughter.] The gentleman is two-thirds correct, and that is just how careless his party is in spending the people's money. It is true this $15,000 is a mere little bagatelle, but you have got to begin saving the dimes, and the dollars will take care of themselves.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield again if the gentleman can explain it.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman answer my question? I will admit that the amount is $15,000 instead of $10,000.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to answer it.

Mr. BEGG. Answer it "yes" or "no."

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to answer it in a minute.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman answer "yes" or "no" whether he would have the United States remain away and deny this $15,000 if all the other nations are going to participate?

Mr. BLANTON. I would have the United States remain away under the present crisis and save this $15,000, and I would have Great Britain remain away and send us that $15,000 as a penny payment on the interest she owes us. I would have France, Italy, and Belgium each stay away and each send us that $15,000 as an interest payment on the huge sums of money they owe us. I would have Japan stay away, and I would have every other nation on the globe stay away except those in the immediate neighborhood, and I would have them economize and use this money to pay their honest debts. That is what I would do.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. What procedure would the gentleman enter into to keep Belgium and England and Japan at home?

Mr. BLANTON. I would suggest to them that they make a small payment of interest on an overdue debt which they honestly owe us.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman admitted that Peru will have this centennial celebration with the other nations present whether we are represented or not?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but somebody has got to set the example. Some country has got to start the example of saving money and applying it to their debts, and stop the heavy burden of taxation that is upon the shoulders of our people to-day. Somebody has got to begin, and that is the reason I am raising my humble voice in the House. It has got to be started here.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute. I have got to answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] first. Whenever I get to telling the people of the country about some $10,000 political job specially created for an Ohio politician somebody wants to ask me a question and thus try to get me off on another subject. I have not gotten away from that subject yet. You know our good friend down in Ohio, Mr. Brown, who is a splendid campaign manager, had to have a job, but what does he know about reorganization as compared with the knowledge of the congressional committee composed of Members of the House and of the Senate, Members who are well up on these propositions, some of whom have been studying this question of reorganization carefully? Yet you have got to create a position and put in an outsider. Is it to do the work for them? Is that what he is there for? He is to get $7,500 a year, and I am here to tell you that that committee could do that work just as well without that gentleman.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BARBOUR. We all know that the gentleman is advocating economy, but does the gentleman realize that the time he has already consumed on this bill has cost the Government practically as much as it would cost to send the commissioners to Peru? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Do you know that is the biggest poppy-cock that I know of with which a Congressman ever excused himself for voting away the people's money.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. There is a good deal of truth in it.

Mr. BLANTON. Consuming time! My God, gentlemen, we waste the whole of every Saturday here when the House adjourns over from Friday afternoon to Monday and nothing is going on here except regular expenses. Next Friday there will be a motion passed to let us all go and spend a week end at home, and there will not be anything going on here on Saturday except expenses, and the first thing you know, when the Senate begin their three months' debate on the tariff bill, you will find this House under a gentlemen's agreement adjourning three days at a time for weeks and even months, with nothing to do, and the expense goes on just the same. All of our expenses go on just the same whether we work or adjourn.

It would be better for the people of the country if we took more time to discuss each proposition to take money out of the Treasury, even in little driblets of $15,000 each, each one a small item, but which put together make an enormous sum at the end of the year. If you do not stop spending the $15,000 driblets that so often come out of the Treasury unnecessarily you never will begin to save or to reduce taxes. Talk about it being a small matter! Why, $15,000 is too small for some Congressmen to consider at all. They would not delay the passage of a bill to talk about a $15,000 item. When this other political job came up here to-day, another politician had to have a $10,000 job. Those seven States out West want to adjust the question of the water in the Colorado River. The Secretary of the Interior knows all about that question. He has his servants paid out of the Treasury who are out there on the ground in every one of those States, familiar with all the conditions, from the Reclamation Service. Instead of letting the Secretary of the Interior look after that whole matter, with only 17 votes against the bill, you passed the bill here a few minutes ago to create another unnecessary job and authorized an expenditure of $10,000, which the President under that authorization could authorize in salary to some political constituent.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. I understand the gentleman to preach economy to his Republican friends——

Mr. BLANTON. It is not to my colleagues on this side; I used to preach to them when we were in power, but with little avail. I am preaching now to the fellows on the other side of the aisle who have the power.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman did not let me finish my question.

Mr. BLANTON. I will let the gentleman finish his question.

Mr. WINGO. I understand the gentleman is preaching economy to the Republicans. Does he not know that that flies in the face of the Biblical injunction:

> Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I am not as well up in Biblical quotations as my good friend from Arkansas, but I want to say that you can sometimes control even the way that a hog goes by putting certain limitations on both sides and behind him. I am putting the limitations upon you, my colleagues on the other side of the House, the limitations of your campaign pledge of economy that you made on the hustings last fall when you asked the people to put you in power. You did promise them economy. No matter how much you preach economy it takes votes to put it into effect. It takes votes to stop extravagance; it takes votes to stop having to pay 5¼ per cent interest on Treasury certificates for one and two years that our Treasurer is issuing almost monthly to get money to pay the bills.

Mr. MADDEN. Who created that obligation?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Illinois voted for almost every bill that took it out of the Treasury, and I admire him for it. Some of them were foolish bills, but during the war he stood there like a patriotic citizen, he and his associates, and voted for the necessary amount of money to win the war, and I admire them for it. The war is now over; nearly three years have passed and you must now forget it. We must get out of the war-time proposition and watch every single bill that comes on the floor that takes money out of the Public Treasury. Every bill that is reported from a committee I look over and question myself is it necessary, can we get along without it, is it one that must pass for the benefit of the country? These questions I put to myself on every single bill reported out of the committee. Even though I am only one man, every single bill that we can get along without, that is not absolutely necessary, I am going to vote against, and I am going to put you gentlemen on record if you do not anticipate me, and get a quorum here first to prevent a record vote. I know that I can not always get the yeas and nays, but if you do not anticipate me and get a quorum here first, I am going to put you on record every time when you want to take money out of the Public Treasury and let the people at home know who votes their money away.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to suspend the rules and pass Senate joint resolution 34.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 106 ayes and 17 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote, because there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 207, nays 42, not voting 181, as follows:

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. KNUTSON with Mr. WISE.

Mr. HUTCHINSON with Mr. PADGETT.

Mr. PURNELL with Mr. SULLIVAN.

Mr. MCPHERSON with Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. WALSH with Mr. POU.

Mr. LONGWORTH with Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina.

Mr. SPROUL with Mr. MONTAGUE.

Mr. EDMONDS with Mr. BUCHANAN.

Mr. WATSON with Mr. TYSON.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri with Mr. WILSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Miss ROBERTSON). On this vote the yeas are 207 and the nays 42. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. Two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules are suspended and the joint resolution is passed.

Mr. WALSH resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

BRIDGE ACROSS MAHONING RIVER, OHIO.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 4976) granting the consent of Congress to the Trumbull Steel Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio, with the committee amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Trumbull Steel Co. and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate at a point suitable to the interest of navigation a dam across the Mahoning River near the city of Warren, in the county of Trumbull, in the State of Ohio: Provided, That the work shall not be commenced until the plans therefor have been filed with and approved by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That no dam constructed under the consent hereby granted shall be used to develop water power nor to generate electricity: And provided further, That the authority hereby granted shall cease and be null and void unless the actual construction of the dam herein authorized be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a second.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill granting the consent of Congress to the Trumbull Steel Co. to erect a dam across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio. The Mahoning River is a very small stream, although it is classed as a navigable stream. It is full of dams from one end of it to the other, and in the dry season the water gets so low that there is not enough water in the stream to supply the industries along its banks. There are a great many steel industries along the banks of this river, and they are compelled to erect little dams and impound the water to give them enough for their industrial purposes. The War Department has approved it with the amendment. This is a matter that should be attended to now, because it is holding up a $3,000,000 steel plant at the present time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman says that it is not a navigable stream?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. It is classed as one, although it is one of these creeks that has not enough water in it to pull a canoe over in the dry season.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was wondering how it ever came to Congress if it were not a navigable stream.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. We are sorry that it is classed as a navigable stream.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. This is wholly within the State of Ohio?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The stream runs into the State of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and, in the judgment of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 153, permitting the admission of certain aliens who sailed from certain ports on or before June 8, 1921, and for other purposes, as amended by the committee, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That aliens of any nationality who are brought to the United States on vessels which departed from foreign ports on or before June 8, 1921, destined for the United States, and who apply in the month of June, 1921, for admission to the United States, may, if otherwise admissible, be admitted to the United States although the limit prescribed by section 5 of the act entitled "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved May 19, 1921, may have been reached before such application for admission. The number of aliens of any nationality so admitted shall be deducted, under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe, from the number of aliens of that nationality admissible during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1921, under the provisions of such act of May 19, 1921, but nothing in this resolution shall prohibit the admission of otherwise admissible aliens of any nationality during the month of July, 1921, up to 20 per cent of the number of aliens of that nationality admissible during such fiscal year under the provisions of such act of May 19, 1921, as heretofore promulgated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. BOX. Yes; I will withhold it for a moment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman from Washington have any objection to extending the time for debate 10 minutes on a side, making it 30 minutes on each side instead of 20?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection to considering a second as ordered? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Texas makes a point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-one Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 108, noes 46.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are 247 Members present, a quorum. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] to 20 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be notified when I have consumed five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will notify the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this House joint resolution No. 153 is offered in an effort to correct a situation in connection with the 3 per cent quota law, which arose owing to the fact that a portion of the present month of June was added to the one-year suspension bill. At the time the bill was passed I think the majority of the members of the Immigration Committee knew there would be some confusion in connection with the June arrivals. But it was not feasible to propose in the bill then any form of flexibility, for the reason that whatever margin we proposed would serve only to invite further crowding. June was not even given the benefit of a 20 per cent maximum which the other months have. The House will remember that when a bill from the House committee was proposed for the temporary restriction of immigration 60 days were allowed in which to clear the seas of ships which might be carrying immigrants. We accepted the Senate bill which came to us after some delay, so that when both Houses had finally passed the bill and it had become a law by the signature of the President, the time remaining until the 1st of July was very short. The bill as finally passed allowed but 15 days in which the seas might be cleared and in which the quotas of immigrants from various countries determined. In fact, the 3 per cent bill became a law on May 19. It provided that the part of it which set up the machinery should be effective at once, and it was part of the duties of the three Secretaries named in the bill to establish and promulgate the quotas of aliens admissible from various countries. That turned out to be a difficult task on account of new geographical boundaries in central Europe. The result was that the notices of established quotas were given out in three lots, and one lot, including the country of Italy, was promulgated here in the city of Washington as late as the night of June 2, whereas the part of law establishing and requiring adherence to the quotas went into effect on June 3.

The bill, as I said, allowed 15 days for the clearing of the seas. Quite a number of ships, including small sailing ships from various countries, had set sail prior to May 19, when the law itself was passed, and failed to reach port within 15 days.

Among these ships were some arriving at Boston and subports—the St. Vincente, which left Lisbon on May 20, or one day after the law was signed by the President; the schooner William H. Draper, which left Cape Verde April 30, or nearly three weeks before the President signed the bill; the schooner Emma and Helen, which left Cape Verde May 7. All of those had immigrants in small numbers. So in the consideration of this measure you must consider the fact that the immigrants from Spain and Portugal had set out for the United States before the act of May 19 was the law, and that they brought immigrants from countries whose quotas were filled by the first arrivals.

Now, then, in addition to that, several ships of regular lines left Italy, departing prior to June 3 or soon thereafter on their regular days of departure, bringing immigrants. Some of these ships arrived on June 2, one day before this 3 per cent law went into effect; these immigrants, of course, were not counted. Another arrived a day later than its schedule on June 3, the very day the law became effective; others arrived two or three days later, with sufficient immigrants to exceed the quota of 3,000 allowed to Italy for that fraction of the month of June. These ships had had neither time nor information to permit them to prorate Italy's June quota of immigrants.

Gentlemen, your committee, after holding hearings and giving a good deal of attention to the matter, decided not only on account of humane considerations but on account of the fact that the law did not give the time in which to clear the seas and because we were unable to distribute the quotas in time, brought in this resolution, which permits aliens who set sail prior to a certain date, in the fore part of June, coming here as immigrants, to be admitted to the United States and to be charged against the quotas within the 3 per cent for the fiscal year which begins on July 1. An amendment provides that the July quotas shall not be disturbed. The gross admissions allowed for June and for all of the next fiscal year remain exactly as they were. Not one additional alien is admitted.

I think my statement covers the case exactly. I will reserve, Mr. Speaker, the balance of my time.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, in the time allotted me I can not say what I wish to say about this bill. On May 19 last the President of the United States signed the immigration bill, which we passed a few days prior to the signing. That bill, while it did not express my views regarding immigration entirely, will do a great deal toward checking immigration if properly enforced and not meddled with by Congress. That bill was passed in answer to the mandate of the people last year who demanded that Congress pass an immigration law that would really restrict immigration.

On the 3 per cent basis as provided for in the immigration bill the quota of immigrants for the month of June was exhausted many days ago. The resolution we have before the House now is inspired by the owners of the ships engaged in transporting immigrants from Europe to the United States of America. During the hearings before the Immigration Committee it was developed that the owners of the ships carried the immigrants who now seek entrance into the United States in excess of the quota allowed under the immigration bill, and the immigrants on the said ships were informed of the passage of the law and knew of the conditions that prevailed in this country regarding immigration; but dsregarding the information that they could not enter the United States, they raced across the ocean to Ellis Island, and now we have nearly 10,000 aliens who are undertaking to force their entry into the United States.

No doubt this resolution will pass, because the Republican Party has always, during the last few years especially, catered to the big interests to the detriment of the masses in the United States. There has been a lobby at work in Washington to influence the passage of this resolution. If the resolution does not pass, the owners of the ships will, under the law, be required to carry the immigrants back to the countries from whence they came without charge. If the resolution passes, these aliens will be permitted to land in the United States in violation of the solemn judgment of Congress a few weeks ago.

No wonder the people are becoming disgusted already at the way this Republican Congress is handling the affairs of the Nation. When Congress passes a bill that is worth anything great publicity is given it, as was done when the immigration bill was passed, but now you have undertaken to nullify the bill which the people demand that you pass, and I dare say that you will not court much publicity on the passage of this resolution, for you know that the people of the United States are tired of the influx of immigrants from Europe to this country.

Mr. Speaker, there are millions of people out of employment in the United States to-day, especially in the large industrial centers. To allow more immigrants to come into this country at this time only makes greater competition for the laborers who are trying to find employment. The laboring classes are protesting against Europeans coming to this country. They know that it means competition to them; that it means reducing the standard of American living for the working men. Mr. Speaker, our first duty here is to guard well the interests of those who produce. Of course I realize that the great steel corporations, the big mining interests and railroad interests of the country will be glad to see as many immigrants as possible, because they can work the illiterate European for less money than demanded by the American laborer.

Mr. Speaker, there is not nor have I ever heard of a bolshevist, anarchist, or syndicalist in this country who was born and reared here. They come from Europe to our country to enjoy the privileges and immunities of this great Government; but, Mr. Speaker, on account of the lax enforcement of the immigration laws of this country thousands of anarchists and men who do not believe in our laws and our form of government have been dumped upon society. It is time that we put the bars up. The aliens now detained at Ellis Island knew when they left Europe that they could not enter America lawfully. The shipowners knew it. There is a law to penalize the owners of the ships for bringing these people to our shores. It should be enforced. The aliens now at Ellis Island should be required to return to their homes and the shipowners should be required under the law to carry them back without charge. If this resolution does not pass, the shipowners will be forced to return the immigrants to Europe.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of this resolution. It establishes a bad precedent. If it passes it will return in the near future to annoy those who passed it. I am in favor of preventing all immigration to the United States for at least 10 years, and I dare say that I voice the sentiment of a large majority of the American people when I say this. Gentlemen of the House, I sincerely trust this resolution will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, within 15 days after the passage of an act enacted with due deliberation, considered deliberately by both branches of the Congress, approved by the President, and published to the world, we are receding; we are taking back what we said. This situation and this proposed action can only be accounted for on one of three theories: First, that the legislation itself was so bungling as to be futile and as to force Congress and the executive branches to admit its futility and, to the extent here proposed, to abandon efforts to enforce it; or, second, that the executive branch, charged with the performance of the duties of computing and promulgating quotas, has been guilty of some such default as to make it inequitable and inhumane to enforce it. Or we did not mean what we said and have not the courage to stand by it in the face of the situation that naturally results, and which might have been, and really was, anticipated, and are here to-day in the name of the United States undoing what we deliberately did.

Now, I respectfully request that the Members of the House read the report, because I had something to do with writing the minority views. I would like to have you read that.

First, is the law futile? Shall we admit that it is? Shall we admit that it is so much of a bungle as to be unworkable? That is what we are proposing to do. One thing is certain. We know now that the coming of those people was unlawful. We knew it and they knew it just as well 15 and 30 days ago as they know it now. What new light, what process of clarification or explanation, has enabled us to know now that the law is being violated that did not enable these people to know it then?

As to whether or not the executive departments have taken the steps which the law requires them to take, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of Commerce promulgated and published these quotas with reasonable promptness and completed the work before the law went into effect, so that no default can be charged to them.

We are left, then, with the last theory, and that is that we passed the law and did not mean it, or have not the courage to enforce it in the face of a situation created by men who violated the law with their eyes open to relieve them of the consequences of having come in conflict with the law. They are conclusively presumed to have known it.

Now, did the steamship people know that this law was passed and know what these quotas were? The percentage plan, involving the 3 per cent, was discussed on the floor of this House nearly six months ago. It was published in the RECORD. It was published in the committee hearings. The Commissioner General of Immigration stated that he had told them in advance what it was. The fact is, they watched your doings carefully.

They have a well-equipped organization here, and they know more about what is being done with regard to immigration legislation here than any Member of this House, and it is a pitiful thing for us and the executive departments to say now that because the steamship companies did not know what the law was we will not enforce it against them.

Mr. WYANT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. WYANT. What number of people will be affected by this proposed law?

Mr. BOX. There are some thousands of them, I will say; something like 10,000 people, but I greatly fear this is the beginning of a more serious weakening of the law. In the generosity of the relief we are granting the steamship companies and aliens violating this law and expecting to violate it we do not stop with admitting those who started before the law went into effect or immediately after the law went into effect, but we have jumped ahead five days and said everybody who started June 8 or before that time shall be admitted. The Secretary of State, representing the dignity and majesty of the law of the United States, on being inquired of by a foreign power, told them before the law went into effect—told the ambassador of Italy—that if they brought more than the number stated they would not be admitted.

Look at the hearings. If anybody is to crawfish on that statement of Secretary Hughes, it will not be this member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would it not be fair to state that the Department of State urges legislation of this kind, and admits that the quotas were sent out at the very last moment, and says further that the quotas could not be distributed among the steamship companies that make it a business of transporting these people?

Mr. BOX. I can not yield further, much as I would like to favor the genial gentleman from Washington. The Secretary of State did not so advise the committee. I understood he desired it, but I do not understand why. I know that the Commissioner General of Immigration testified that Secretary Hughes wired the Italian ambassador before this law went into effect—he was told before the 1st of June—that the numbers which the steamship companies then proposed to bring could not be admitted. In defiance of that statement by the Secretary of State they came. They either did not wait to get the answer or they came after receiving it. In either case they knew that they were violating our law. If he now wants them admitted, his attitude is a distinct disappointment to me.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois rose.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question in good faith?

Mr. BOX. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Did the immigrants know?

Mr. BOX. I think they did; as well as the poor creatures can ever know.

Mr. CANNON. If they were——

Mr. BOX. The gentleman will pardon me for seeming to be impolite. My time is limited. The gentleman knows my great respect for him. The steamship companies admitted to Commissioner General Husband that they knew it, and that they placed it before the immigrants.

Mr. CANNON. If they were taken back now, would it be competent for them to come again? Are they otherwise qualified to be admitted?

Mr. BOX. They would have to be examined, if the gentleman please, to determine whether they would otherwise be qualified for admission.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BOX. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am interested in what the gentleman says. What serious effect will come to the country if these people are charged to the next year's quota, in general results now?

Mr. BOX. The primary thing is the fact that the people who have been violators of our immigration laws as far back as the history of our immigration laws goes have, with the law before them, defied it; and if absolutely nothing else were involved, after the United States said "We want and will admit so many people coming in a certain way and in certain numbers," stating that if they do not comply with the law they will be excluded, I would demand that they accommodate themselves to the law. It should not now be retroactively made to accommodate their profit-seeking purposes; such action compromises national self-respect. We are now saying, "If they appear they shall be admitted." Again, I greatly fear that this is the beginning of a weak and cowering attitude on our part and on the part of those who are expected to enforce the law. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I had a part in the writing of the minority report, signed by me, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RAINEY], which I incorporate as a part of my remarks herein.

The act of Congress preventing the admission during any one year of immigrants from any country numbering more than 3 per cent of the people of that country within the United States passed the House on the 22d day of April, 1921, and passed the Senate with some minor amendments on the 3d day of May, 1921. The conference report was agreed to by the House and Senate on the 13th day of May, 1921; the President approved it May 19, 1921, upon which the portions providing for administrative arrangements went into immediate effect. By its own unconditional terms it went into full effect 15 days after its approval. All of its provisions became effective June 3, 1921.

It has been disregarded by aliens and by steamship companies, most of which are owned by Europeans. Friction and inconvenience has resulted to those who violated the law. It is now proposed that for the convenience and profit of those who created this situation the United States repeal a part of a law regularly and deliberately enacted.

This situation and the proposition based upon it rests upon one or more of the following hypotheses:

1. That the act of both branches of the present Congress, approved by the President, is such a bungle that at the suggestion of corporate interests and alien peoples whose action concerning us it was designed to regulate, but who have disregarded it, we must now rectify the blunder; or

2. That there has been some such blunder or default by those charged with carrying out the provisions of the law as to make the enforcement of its provisions as intended and written futile and inequitable or inhumanely harsh; or

3. That corporate interests, chiefly alien, and alien peoples affected have contemptuously disregarded our law, and the executive and legislative branches of the Government now propose to weaken and accommodate the law to the convenience and profit-seeking purposes of those who held it in such light regard that they neglected or willfully ignored it.

As to the clumsy and bungling character of the law, it is our judgment that it should not be admitted to be unworkable. Indeed, we believe that good faith, firmness, and diligent effort will enable the United States to enforce its will as expressed in this law.

This measure for its impairment by modification is not entitled to favor on the theory as to the second hypothesis mentioned above—that because of some dereliction of our administrative officers charged with the performance of the duties of computing and publishing the quotas to be admitted from various regions. The Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor computed and published the quotas of all regions before June 3, when the law went into full effect.

The quotas of the various nationalities were published as follows:
Northwestern European countries: Danzig, Finland, and Africa—May 28.
Southern and eastern European countries: Australia and New Zealand—June 1.
Other countries—June 2.

The record suggests not the slightest dereliction on the part of those charged with the duty of computing and publishing the quotas, as required by the act.

We think the foregoing shows that this situation and the proposition based on it does not result from fatal vices in the law, nor from any default on the part of those who were to compute and publish the quotas. This leaves us no basis on which to account for this situation and for this proposition to change the law for the benefit of those who have already come in conflict with it now before the House, other than the fact that the steamship companies and the immigrants now to be relieved are alone responsible for a situation created by them in disregard of our law, with full knowledge of the consequences in their possession, or properly imputable to them, and that it is now proposed by this resolution that we compromise the majesty and dignity of the law for the profit and convenience of those who acted in contempt of our Government.

This measure is for the benefit of two groups—the steamship companies and the immigrants they have brought. The steamship lines are in the main foreign ones; they are associated together, and continuously maintain representatives, secret and known, in Washington for the purpose of influencing legislation, including, of course, knowledge of what is proposed and done. They are usually, if not always, present at the meetings of your Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. Frequently their reporters take down the proceedings of the committee, including the words of its members, to be reported to their foreign masters. We have no doubt they watch the Senate committee as closely. They watch the proceedings in the House and probably in the Senate. The representatives of some of the individual lines have been vigorously, continuously, and persistently opposing this legislation. They appeared before the Senate committee last winter, when the measures then involved in it were pending in the Sixty-sixth Congress. Hon. W. W. Husband, now Commissioner General of Immigration, appeared before the Senate committee during those hearings and testified, inserting tables, showing an approximation of the quotas of many countries, including Italy. His testimony, with these tables, was published in the hearings and newspapers, then, along with the testimony of the many representatives of the steamship lines appearing in opposition to it. We are perfectly safe in saying that no person connected with either branch of Congress or with the executive branch of the Government had more minute, accurate, or earlier information as to every phase of immigration legislation or administration than they had.

To set aside our law now on the pretense that they did not know all of the restrictions which it imposed upon them is a self-abasing, hypocritical pretense, wholly inconsistent with truth or a proper appreciation of the dignity and honor of our Government.

We are advised that the Italian Government has protested to our Government against the enforcement of the law as to this particular lot of immigrants, and against the entire act, but we are not advised as to the exact grounds of the protest.

The Government of Italy during last winter advised our Government that it had discontinued the issuance of passports to persons intending to emigrate to the United States until it could learn what kind of immigrants we desired. This advice was communicated by the Department of State to the chairmen of both the House and Senate committees dealing with the subject, as was doubtless anticipated, but it did not stop these committees nor Congress in their purpose to enact restrictive legislation. We have discovered no evidence that Italy did in fact discontinue the issuance of such passports, but we have discovered evidence that Italy and some other European countries are anxious to get rid of some of the less productive and less desirable portions of their population.

Very soon after the President approved the act of the present session, on May 19, and before June 1, and also before the sailing of the Italian vessels now asking for relief, the Italian ambassador communicated with Mr. Secretary Hughes on this subject, using substantially the following language:

> We have in Italian ports ready booked, berths assigned, and everything prepared to sail approximately 11,000 steerage passengers and about 1,000 others.
> The Secretary, of course, told them that they could not. (Testimony, Commissioner General Husband, Hearings, p. 86.)

But they either did not wait for the answer or sailed after receiving it. In either event, they evidently relied upon a weakness of the United States Government which would enable them to defy its laws and the statement of its State Department.

The resolution now before the House indicates that their appraisal of our strength was correct.

The other beneficiaries of this measure will be the immigrants themselves. If they know that, their numbers will be in excess of the June quota fixed under the law? We know that their Government knew it and that the steamship lines did, but it is less certain that individuals among the emigrants did. What shall we do, then?

First, we must remember the rule that we apply to our own people, "Ignorance of the law excuses no one." Why should foreign steamship lines and aliens of whom other countries are trying to get rid have the benefit of an exemption from this sound and necessary rule?

We can come as near showing that they knew this fact as we can of showing that excess arrivals of the future will know it.

Upon the hearings on this resolution the chairman of the House committee said:

> The CHAIRMAN. That these quotas, under the 3 per cent plan for the fiscal year, were printed at various times in the record and elsewhere from December until March. (Hearings, p. 82.)

Commissioner General Husband testified on the same point as follows:

> Mr. HUSBAND. * * * Let me illustrate by taking the two countries most affected—Italy and Poland. The tentative statement of the probable quota under the law was published, I think, in March, on the 3 per cent basis. It has been repeated in debates in Congress and appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I think, in several places, and in the hearings of the Senate committee. (Hearings, p. 82.)

Both of these statements were fully warranted. In addition, all the world affected by the act was charged with knowledge that it was approved by the President May 19, and in force after June 2. The Governments of Europe, including those affected, knew it. The correspondence between the Italian Government and Secretary Hughes proves that that Government knew it, and that it was in touch with the steamship lines, and knew how many emigrants they were bringing, and that they were in excess of the number admissible. The steamship companies knew it, and admitted that they told the emigrants. Commissioner General Husband testified before the committee that the steamship people admitted to him that they had presented this very matter to the emigrants themselves.

Their knowledge was probably indistinct and confused, but just as clear as is the knowledge of those who have been continuously embarking since June 3, and of those who will continuously embark hereafter. A few of them will know distinctly what they are doing; many will know it dimly, as these did; but they will continue to come, bringing a mixture of ignorance and contempt, and finding that they can trample upon the law at the threshold, will have an increased disposition to say, "Damn the United States!" which these latter-day immigrants have often been heard to say when slightly crossed in their desire to rush into our abundance, regardless of our feeble restraints.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. WHITE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, even if we should admit the indictment brought against the steamship companies by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX], and if he had made it stronger than he made it, it would not relieve this emergency. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas and to the Members of this House that there is no purpose in the minds of the committee, and there is no purpose in the departments charged with the administration of this law, that one jot or one tittle shall pass from the law, but that all shall be fulfilled. The passage of this bill marks a new policy in American Government and administration. The day has passed when we can sing as we did 50 years ago—

> Come along, come along, make no delay;
> Come from every nation, come from every way,
> Our lands are broad enough,
> So don't you be alarmed,
> For Uncle Sam is rich enough
> To give us all a farm.
> But not so now.

The public domain is gone. A wicked and vicious philosophy has taken possession of the minds of many of the people of the Old World, and if there ever was a time when we should safeguard the civilization of America and the spirit of Americanism that time is to-day. [Applause.] Gentlemen, it was expected that there would be difficulties in the administration of our new law. The only wonder is that they have not been greater. Let me call attention, if I have the time, to a paragraph in the minority report. In the second paragraph they say:

> That there has been some such blunder or default by those charged with carrying out the provisions of the law as to make the enforcement of its provisions as intended and written futile and inequitable, or inhumanely harsh.

Gentlemen, the man who opposes this resolution votes to make the administration of this law inhumanely harsh and inequitable.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I can not yield. I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the numbers arriving here in excess of the quotas are to be charged to the quotas of the different countries for next year. The views of the minority make no mention of this fact. I say to you gentlemen that the only purpose of this resolution is to relieve a distressing emergency, and not, as the minority has stated, to relieve from responsibility any steamship company. Gentlemen have not considered the difficulties in the way of administering this law or of disseminating this information. The gentlemen of the minority admit in their report in discussing this proposition that the departments have done their full duty. I quote again from that report:

The record suggests not the slightest dereliction on the part of those charged with the duty of computing and publishing the quotas, as required by the act.

Gentlemen, it is not reasonable, it is not human, it is not fair to hold these poor people responsible who seek our country for the liberality of its laws and for the opportunities which it presents. I am not in the least surprised that there should have been some friction and that there should have been much difficulty in the administration of this law in the beginning, when it marks for the first time in the history of this great Republic a new policy of government for which the people of America have been clamorously insistent. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, the question is whether you are going to hold absolutely to the letter of the law or whether you are going to observe the spirit of it; whether you are going to insist upon your pound of flesh, or whether you are going to have mercy on these few people, not exceeding 7,000 in number, who have come to this land of promise. Whether you are going to disappoint them and turn them back because of no fault of their own, but because somebody raises the question whether the steamship companies have observed the letter of the law. Perhaps this affects my district more than any other in the United States, my district or those immediately near by. I have had letters from fathers and mothers and from sisters and brothers and sons and daughters asking me to aid in the passage of this emergency legislation, which will allow families to be reunited a few months earlier than they would be otherwise. It does not increase by one poor soul the number who will be admitted to this country eventually, but it does give them just a few days more to enjoy the privileges they are entitled to under this law a little later. It will save relatives, many of them our citizens, expense, annoyance, worry, and disappointment. It will give freedom to a few thousand immigrants who must remain in detention camps or take a long, tedious ocean journey with its attendant discomforts. I prefer to help these people out of their difficulties rather than to appeal to your prejudices or punish the steamship companies for a situation which may or may not be due to their negligence. Surely you can not hold the immigrant is at fault, and it is the women and children who are to be punished and who will suffer if you refuse this relief.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. If the steamship companies next month should violate the law just as they have in this case, with full knowledge, as the record shows, and bring immigrants here contrary to the provisions of the law, would the gentleman be willing to suspend the law in that case and let the others in?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I think that is a contingency which will not arise. If it should, I would be willing, and I think the committee would be able to handle the situation without prejudice.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me answer that. The bill allowed 20 per cent maximum for July, but for June there was no maximum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The hearings show that these people had full knowledge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I suppose I have as consistent a record for restricting immigration as any Member of the House or any member of the Immigration Committee. I see no reason myself why the passage of this resolution in its present form will break down or destroy the present immigration law. It does not add a single immigrant to the number that may come to this country under the law, and it does not increase the number from any country, and there is not anything in the hearings, in my judgment, that will fix the responsibility for this overplus of immigrants for June on anyone. Of course, the law may be in some respects defective. I rather think there was an oversight in arranging the quota that could come in for June. In the month of July, for instance, 71,000 may come, and for the month of June, the way the law is written, only 27,000. So I think it most natural that immigrants seeking to come to this country, knowing this restrictive law was likely to be passed, would crowd the ships so that the first month would find the greatest rush. I do not know, the steamship companies may be at fault, but there is little proof of that. I think the Department of Labor published the regulations as early as possible. Some of these immigrants had sailed before the regulation was published.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. From what country have most of these immigrants come?

Mr. WILSON. Most of them from Italy. The quota that can come in June from that country is a little over 3,000, and the quota that could come in July will be something over 8,000. So if this law had been written so as to make each month equal, we would not have had this trouble. I see no reason why we should increase the burdens of these people, since the effect here is the same.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Where do the most of the immigrants come from?

Mr. WILSON. The greater portion from Italy. Some from Portugal, some from Poland, but there is not anything in the testimony anywhere that fixes the responsibility for this surplus for June on these people. It is true that the ships could go back, or they could back out into the ocean and wait until the 1st of July and then float in, but it would probably be better to admit these now who are anxious to come, are already here, and who sailed before the law was passed, than to send them back and let others take their place. The same number will be admitted if we pass this bill or if we do not.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not true that most of the Italians do not go to the farms?

Mr. WILSON. Just as many will go to the farms out of these immigrants as those who would come in July or any other month. We have passed a law which admits 388,000 to come here while the law is in operation, and this resolution does not increase that number. It is simply a business, humane proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the unfortunate thing on behalf of the committee is that we were denied the opportunity before the committee to present the facts relative to the information on the part of the steamship companies and to the immigrants. Ten million aliens trying to come to the United States to-day, and from the latest report 5,000,000 of unemployed laborers in the United States to-day! There are soup houses, bread lines, unemployed, and then the wail and sympathy for those who have deliberately and contemptuously violated the act of May 19, 1921, as the hearings show. The testimony shows that the Italian Government, through its ambassador, early in May appeared at the department and was advised that its excess of quota could not land. The steamship companies were notified every day and every hour of the day from Washington just how the legislation and matters affected by it stood; every steamship company that was sailing from the ports of New York and Boston and foreign ports was notified; and there is no denial of that fact. On the 2d of June, as the Commissioner of Immigration testified, these ships were racing across the ocean to see who could land his ship and unload their cargo of humanity first. And on the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th these companies were sending their ships loaded from Italian and other ports to land their cargo four and five days after the act became effective. That is the testimony before the committee. The testimony shows that way back in December these ship companies appeared before the Immigration Committee of the Senate, and thereafter had knowledge of this law, and every day from that time on they had the information. The Commissioner of Immigration appeared before the committee on the 10th of this month, saying that they had a cablegram on the 9th saying that about a thousand had been embarked at Palermo to come over here. They wanted to make it on the 9th, but finally the committee made it on the 8th, when the parties could enter if they sailed at any time before the 8th of June, 1921.

Those that were riding on the high seas with the knowledge of the steamship company, and the individuals themselves, over 10,000 of them, embarked and started for this country in defiance of your law and rules and regulations, and now gentlemen come in here with a sympathetic plea that these people be admitted to the United States under the conditions that now exist. I call the attention of Members on the Republican side of this House to another fact: That sympathetic plea is all imagination. Why not be frank and fair? On the 10th of this month an order was made landing these people, and they are all landed now. They are not upon the ships. The Commissioner General of Immigration testified before the committee that under the law he had authority to land them, and that he was going to land them, and that they were being landed, and to-day they are landed, and held under a temporary order.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. If this law is not passed, will not the steamship companies be compelled to transport these people back to the countries from which they sailed?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. The record shows that these people have landed, and the steamship companies have to pay for guards at the rate of $4 a day, and they have to pay for their maintenance and upkeep, and that is the crux of this resolution. Otherwise they would have to be sent back. There is where the emergency exists. The Commissioner of Immigration, under the act of 1917, has admitted these people, and under this condition, under bonds of their own recognizance, he is holding them, and on the 1st day of July, if they are otherwise admissible, they will be admitted before the others that come in July, 1921. So there is no question of sympathy, but it is simply a question of dollars and cents of the steamship company that has deliberately defied the laws of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. If these people are admitted, does the gentleman concede that they will be charged against the percentage of the nationality to which they belong?

Mr. RAKER. I think so, yes; but I will tell the gentleman this, as the commissioner said before the committee—and we did not have time to get it all. On the 15th of July if the quota will be filled, every quota that they have, and across the ocean from Palermo and every other port, there will be coming 10,000 more to land on the 20th of July, and those people will come here with their representatives, pleading on the ground of humanity that they be permitted to enter, when as a matter of fact they have knowledge and notice, and they will be here at the time for that purpose, and again on the 1st of August and the 15th of August these steamship companies who have defied this law and this Congress, when they knew the facts, will again have filled their quotas, and they will again by the 10th or the 15th of the month send another 5,000 or 10,000 to land in our ports, to come down here pleading that they be let in, when it is purely and entirely from the record here, a plea of the steamship companies. If you pass this bill their expense—that is, the expense to the steamship companies—will be wiped out. They know what the law is and they say, "We can go to Congress when we want to." If we refuse to pass this law, the steamship companies will pay for the retention of these immigrants at these various stations where they are now being cared for in the proper way, having all the light and heat and clothing and provisions to which they are entitled, and upon the 1st day of July, if they are otherwise admissible, and the order has already been made landing those who have applied—temporarily to be returned—they will be permitted to land before the others that are now on the high seas, racing over here to try to land on the 2d day of July.

That is the situation, and I think the American people ought to at once and for all time settle their own right to pass laws that shall not be broken down by an appeal for sympathy on behalf of foreigners, who know the law, and encouraged by the steamship companies who get pay for bringing them here. I do not know how many, but many of these people the moment they come here are ready to destroy the very Government that they claim they want to live under. With your own house not in order, clear your own conscience first of these five millions who are out of employment, and correct the other conditions that confront us before you spend your sympathy on what are called immigrants, when, as a mater of fact, the steamship companies all knew of the situation. I want to treat these people right, but they should not defy our laws and come when they know they can not be admitted.

Here W. W. Husband, Commissioner General of Immigration, stated before the committee hearings, pages 81–82:

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Commissioner, the public press carries a statement that the Secretary of Labor has authority, under the immigration law, to handle this excess and to temporarily admit all immigrants producing the excess. Now, I read from the New York World of Friday, June 10, the following statement:

"The Secretary of Labor, Mr. Henning said,"—Mr. Henning is the Assistant Secretary, is he not?

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. "Has power under the law to admit 'otherwise inadmissible' aliens under such conditions as he sees fit, but it has been used only in emergencies. Crowded conditions on ships on which the immigrants are being held in New York and Boston, Mr. Henning said, have created such an emergency."

Do you know, as a matter of fact, whether the Department of Labor has reached the conclusion that it may admit this excess of immigrants, amounting to between 6,000 and 8,000, under the provisions of the immigration law, as indicated by that statement?

Mr. HUSBAND. I think the Assistant Secretary, and perhaps the Secretary also, have reached the conclusion that they have the power to admit these aliens temporarily under the ninth proviso of section 3.

Mr. WILSON. Of the immigration law?

Mr. HUSBAND. Of the immigration law; yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. Do you know if they purpose to carry out that conclusion by admitting them?

Mr. HUSBAND. If that is the purpose?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. HUSBAND. That has not been determined, as I understand it. I talked with Mr. Henning after I left the State Department and my attention was called to this newspaper statement—you mentioned it, Mr. Chairman—I talked to Mr. Henning about it, and he said that it was not his intention or purpose to admit all who were here or to admit all who were now on the way; that if it was shown that they—the steamship companies, I presume he meant—did not know that the law had gone into effect, and had not had sufficient notice of the quotas available, that he would be inclined to admit the immigrants coming under those circumstances, but, on the contrary, if it was shown that they did have knowledge of the enactment of the law and, presumably, of the quotas allotted, he would not admit them.

Mr. WILSON. Well, has the department taken any steps to find out if these steamship companies did have knowledge of the ones sailing since the quotas were promulgated?

Mr. HUSBAND. Not to my knowledge, beyond the fact that they have asked me what I knew about it, which is not very definite, my knowledge on the subject.

Let me illustrate by taking the two countries most affected, Italy and Poland. The tentative statement of the probable quota under the law was published, I think, in March, on the 3 per cent basis. It has been repeated in debates in Congress, and appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I think, in several places, and in the hearings of the Senate committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Earlier than March; in January, was it not?

Mr. HUSBAND. Possibly so, but anyhow in March.

Mr. WILSON. What was that? I did not understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. That these quotas, under the 3 per cent plan for the fiscal year, were printed at various times in the RECORD and elsewhere, from December until March.

Mr. HUSBAND. And since that time, in the public press. It was obvious that under the percentage law the quota of Italy would be changed only very slightly. It was obvious that it would be changed by a portion of the quota which in these published papers was assigned to Austria, for the reason that certain Austrian territory had been transferred to Italy as the result of the war. But they were officially notified of that by the department, or by the knowledge which was simply common knowledge, and I think they must have known that the law was going to be enacted at a very early date. I think the surprise was that it was not enacted at an earlier date than it was, and so, had they cared to do so, they had ample opportunity to make their plans to keep within the Italian quota, but they apparently elected not to do so. I have no doubt that some of these ships that came into the ports on the third of the month, started out with the intention of getting in on the second, if possible. Others have sailed since that time with an excess of the quota.

Now, the other example is Poland. The quota of Poland was in doubt until June 2, when it was finally published by the Secretary of Labor, at the direction of the three Secretaries who prepared it. I know that Poland expected a very much larger quota than they received. I saw one estimate from a Polish source of more than 58,000 who would be accredited to Poland. They have a few over 20,000 instead of the 58,000. If they went on the assumption that they were to have an annual quota of 58,000 during the year, I see quite well that is what the June quota would have been, but they counted as a part of Polish territory certain provinces or governments of Russia which the State Department does not consider to be a part of Poland.

Mr. BOX. And they did that counting, knowing your board was the one to do the computing?

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes; but I say that if in making plans ahead two, three, or four weeks, as they were obliged to, they probably appealed, or might have appealed, to the best possible source of information, that source of information very probably would have suggested to them that the quota would have been 58,000 for the year, instead of 20,000.

Again, hearings, pages 83–84, 85:

Mr. RAKER. Just this, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Husband, with east Galicia and Poland proper, it would only make 25,000 anyhow.

Mr. HUSBAND. It would only make 25,000; 58,000 could only be arrived at by adding a considerable part of western Russia.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let me interrupt to say that I was just in touch with the Assistant Secretary of Labor, Mr. Henning, by telephone, and he states, in response to inquiry as to the correctness of this and other interviews, that the newspapers have given his statement a little different twist from what he actually said; that he said that he thought he might have authority to admit some of these. That clears that up. Further, Mr. Henning has agreed to come up as quickly as he can get away down there. He is tied up for half an hour.

Now, I want to ask Commissioner General Husband if the resolution which is before the committee, No. 153, which reads, "That aliens of any nationality who are brought to the United States on vessels which departed from foreign ports on or before June 8, 1921, destined for the United States, and who apply in the month of June, 1921, for admission to the United States, may, if otherwise admissible, be admitted to the United States, although the limit prescribed by section 5 of the act entitled 'An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States,' approved May 19, 1921, may have been reached before such application for admission," would not be broken down if we undertake to consider a vessel which sailed, according to the report which is presented, on the 9th, and if we considered that date to include that date, if we then would not have, by the time we got this resolution on the floor of the House, to lift the date of the 10th to read the 11th?

Mr. HUSBAND. I think not, Mr. Chairman. That vessel which sailed on the 9th will arrive probably between the 21st and the 29th, and if they were obliged to wait until after the 1st of July it would not be a serious matter. The only other vessel reported as bringing immigrants is one which leaves—I will not say when it leaves, but it is due to arrive here on the 28th of June. That clearly could wait for three days, until the 1st of July.

Mr. FREE. Do you not think it would be a mighty salutary lesson to some of these steamship companies to have some regard for the United States laws if we refused to help them in this situation and made them take these people back?

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes; I do, Mr. Congressman, if it would work out that way, but it is a situation which I think should be looked at from a practical viewpoint, and for several reasons it would be practically impossible to accomplish that.

Take our own service. Supposing there were 6,000 in excess, or 6,000 who might be in excess. Perhaps 10 per cent of those would be admitted under the exceptions to the law. A thousand might be admitted. That would leave 5,000. That means that 5,000 individuals have the right to an examination under the immigration law, and if an inspector examines them, and, in his opinion, they are not entitled to land, it is his duty to refer the list to a board of special inquiry consisting of three persons. The board of special inquiry would have to hear each case formally and make its recommendation, which would be to exclude. An appeal lies in the case to the Secretary of Labor, and the chances are that every one of those 5,000 cases would be appealed to the Secretary of Labor, and with the legitimate work, the normal work that is coming along, I doubt if those 5,000 cases could be handled before September or possibly October.

Mr. FREE. What would happen to these people in the meantime, Mr. Husband?

Mr. HUSBAND. In the meantime—I will speak of that phase—if they are once examined by an immigration inspector and held, they are detained immigrants. They must be held, fed at the expense of the steamship company, and otherwise cared for by the Immigration Service under the law. The detention quarters at Ellis Island will accommodate 2,000. Those will be in use with the ordinary traffic which comes through most of the time during the summer. That is about the only detention place they have that could begin to take care of them, and there is no place to detain them.

Mr. FREE. Outside of that, the food is taken care of by the steamship company?

Mr. HUSBAND. They are fed at the expense of the steamship company.

Mr. FREE. Then the expense to this Government would be sort of policing them?

Mr. HUSBAND. Policing and guarding, and furnishing them with a place to eat and a place to sleep.

Again, on page 86 of hearings:

Mr. FREE. As I understand, Mr. Husband, your information is that these steamship companies did admit they knew of the passage of this act, and their only excuse is that they were not satisfied as to what the quotas would be.

The CHAIRMAN. Not fully informed, you mean, instead of satisfied?

Mr. HUSBAND. Not fully informed. I am inclined to think that they possibly thought this way, "We know nothing about this law until we are officially informed; we know nothing about the quota until we are officially informed what the quota will be, consequently we will go ahead with our business in the ordinary way." I can not see any other reason for it.

Mr. CABLE. Did the Government take specific steps to notify these steamship companies, except what they learned from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the newspapers? Did they send out telegrams, or write any letters, or have you not any records at all of notification?

Mr. HUSBAND. The only records in the case—I think it was on the day of Justice White's funeral. Now, if we can fix that date——

Mr. BOX. That was prior to June 1.

Mr. HUSBAND. It was prior to June 1. It was soon after May 19, I think. I was out of the office, and Mr. Claude Bennett, who represents the steamship companies here, or his bureau of information represents them, came to the office with a telegram which included a telegram which the steamship lines had sent to me, the lines bringing immigrants from Italy. Because it was a holiday I did not receive the telegram that day, but Mr. Bennett brought in a copy of it. I did the best I could in figuring out the probable quota for June. I could not do it officially at all, because the population basis had not been published at that time, but I did tell him what the minimum number would be. It was somewhere about 3,000.

Mr. BOX. Did you do that in writing, or by word?

Mr. HUSBAND. I just gave him that by word. Then on the same day the Italian ambassador sent a telegram to the Secretary, which was likewise delayed because of the holiday, to perhaps three days later. The specific question put up was this: "We have in Italian ports ready booked, berths assigned, and everything prepared to sail, approximately 11,000 steerage passengers, and about a thousand others"—anyhow, the total was approximately 12,000, and asking if they could not be admitted if they were to arrive in June. The Secretary, of course, told them that they could not.

Mr. FREE. Then they sent them anyway, did they not?

Again, on page 96 of hearings:

Mr. RAKER. But if on the 15th of July, 1921, the quota has been filled, and on the 17th a thousand arrive, we are just where we are today, are we not?

Mr. HUSBAND. Oh, yes.

Mr. RAKER. So if the steamship companies can pull this off and they have got their minds made up they can just do about what they please with Congress, because from the testimony before the committee, which appears from the publication, their agents had absolute notice of this, and not only that but the companies abroad; is not that right, Mr. Husband?

Mr. HUSBAND. I think that applies to the Italian quotas, as I said before. I can see no excuse for bringing in a great number of Italians from Italy in excess of the quota. In the case of Poland—I think you were here when I explained the situation there?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I heard your explanation.

Mr. HUSBAND. I can see how, with the lack of knowledge as to what the quota was going to be, they would take what they considered to be the best available information on the subject, and arrange their business accordingly.

Mr. RAKER. What I am getting at is this. I am getting down now to the steamship companies and their agents. It would hardly be conceivable that any of these steamship companies did not know when this bill passed the House, when it passed the Senate, when the conference report was adopted by the House, when it was adopted by the Senate, when it went to the President, when it was signed, and when it became a law, and then they had 15 days after it was signed before it became effective.

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. There is not any possibility of doubt but what they all knew it, is there?

Mr. HUSBAND. Well, they knew that, they knew the law, and in some of the countries they knew, or might have known, the quota, and very probably did know the quota. But in the case of Poland, Greece, Rumania, Hungary, Austria, and Russia, it would have been practically impossible for anyone to have told them.

Mr. RAKER. They got the quota?

Mr. HUSBAND. They got the quota; yes.

Mr. RAKER. What I am getting at is this: When they started, say, on the 3d, 4th, 5th, or 6th of June, the steamship companies, or their agents, clearly knew that there was a limitation, and they would have to comply with it?

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes.

Again, on pages 97, 98, and 99:

Mr. RAKER. Right in that connection, that brings up a question suggested this morning, that under the immigration law they can be fined for trying to bring immigrants in that are not admissible, and they can be compelled to provide for them while they are being held and before they are disposed of.

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. In section 4 of this act of May 19, 1921, it provides:

"That the provisions of this act are in addition to and not in substitution for the provisions of the immigration laws."

Is it your view that the penalties and provisions relative to steamship companies, providing for the care and maintenance of the immigrants before they are admitted and until they are admitted, and the penalties also provided after the immigrants are admitted to land, are applicable if they violate the provisions of this act of May 19, 1921?

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes; I think, Judge RAKER, that it is certainly very clear that all ordinary expenses that are provided for in the law of 1917 are applicable to this, except the matter of fines for bringing them here. Those are more specific in the law, a fine of $25 for this class of case, $200 for another class of case, and that fine would not be applicable in this. That is my understanding, is it not yours, that it would not be applicable to those who are brought in in excess of the quota?

Mr. RAKER. In section 8 of the immigration law it is provided as follows:

"That any person, including the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any vessel, who shall bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, * * * any alien not duly admitted by an immigrant inspector"— shall be subject to a fine.

Mr. HUSBAND. Yes. That is for illegal landings; that is not for bringing them to a port. That is one class of fine for illegal landing. The other class of fine is for bringing to a port certain inadmissible classes.

Mr. RAKER. Well, let us get it clear. The steamship companies bringing to the port of New York immigrants that are not admissible under the law would not be subject to the penalties provided in the immigration act?

Mr. HUSBAND. I am not absolutely clear on that. I believe that all of the fines for bringing to a port in the United States are for specific classes. There is no general fine for bringing in inadmissible immigrants. If they attempt a landing without examination, then the section that you have read applies.

Mr. RAKER. What do you mean, Mr. Husband, that a steamship company can bring to the United States and land in the port of New York, or offer to have landed, 2,000 immigrants, all of whom can not be admitted because this law would not admit them, by reason of the quota having been exhausted, without a penalty being attached to it at all?

Mr. HUSBAND. I think they can, Judge RAKER.

Mr. FREE. They do not get them landed, Judge.

Mr. RAKER. I know.

Mr. HUSBAND. I think no provision was put in here for penalizing steamship companies for bringing an excess quota.

Mr. RAKER. Then they could with impunity start on the 2d, 3d, 4th, or 9th of June, and run the risk of getting the people landed, without being subject to any penalty?

Mr. HUSBAND. I think so.

Mr. FREE. Except that they would have to feed them if we refused to give this relief?

Mr. RAKER. I want to get the penalty. So the steamship companies can just work ad libitum and run the risk of landing?

Mr. FREE. What they have done in this instance.

Mr. RAKER. I want the record to show this fact. Some of us thought there was a penalty.

The CHAIRMAN. No; there is no penalty put in the act. Now, let us get it very clear. In the latter part of section 9 of the old law it says:

"It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien who is excluded by the provisions of section 3 of this act because unable to read, or who is excluded by the terms of section 3 of this act as a native of that portion of the continent of Asia and the islands adjacent thereto described in said section, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that these disabilities might have been detected by the exercise of reasonable precaution prior to the departure of such aliens from a foreign port, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200, and in addition a sum equal to that paid by such alien for his transportation from the initial point of departure, indicated in his ticket, to the port of arrival, for each and every violation of this provision, such latter sum to be delivered by the collector of customs to the alien on whose account assessed. And no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fines, or while the fines remain unpaid, nor shall such fines be remitted or refunded, etc."

Mr. SABATH. All fines apply to nonadmissible aliens.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it says:

"Provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to subject transportation companies to a fine for bringing to ports of the United States aliens who are by any of the provisos or exceptions to section 3 hereof exempted from the excluding provisions of said section."

Mr. RAKER. I wanted the commissioner, before he goes, to give an answer on section 8,

Mr. SABATH. He has given a definite answer.

Mr. RAKER. I want to know if a steamship brings to the port of New York immigrants who can not be admitted under this act because the quota has been exhausted, goes to the wharf and has those immigrants landed on the wharf, with the purpose of having them admitted, is not guilty under the provisions of section 8 of the immigration act.

Mr. HUSBAND. I think, Judge RAKER, that it would be necessary to specify in the act the penalties imposed by section 8 of the immigration law would apply in this case, because they seem to be in section 8 applicable to excluded classes mentioned in section 3 of the law.

Mr. RAKER. I will read the section again:

"That any person, including the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any vessel, who shall bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall attempt, by himself or through another, to bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, * * * any alien not duly admitted by an immigrant inspector or not lawfully entitled to enter or reside within the United States under the terms of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

Mr. HUSBAND. Well, that is a penalty for illegal landing of an immigrant, but landing in that sense means admission to the United States and being free to go wherever you choose.

Mr. KLECZKA. Judge RAKER, how could these companies know that the limit is exhausted until they land at our ports? That is the practical side. That is something that is physically impossible to determine in the last days of the expiring months until they come here, and unless they are going to have a clearing house through this Trans-Atlantic Association, or in some other way, there will be a repetition of this very condition every month.

Mr. RAKER. That is the point I am trying to get at, to see whether this law is defective, and will allow the steamship companies to continue the method they have started now of openly, boldly, and continuously, irrespective of the law that has been debated now in all Congresses for years, there being no criminal penalty, or none sufficient to penalize them, bringing these people over here and expect, the moment they get into port, that every organization and sympathetic fellow among the nationalities of these people will immediately appeal to Congress and their Representatives for the poor unfortunates.

Hon. E. J. Henning, Assistant Secretary of Labor, before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, page 101 of hearings:

Mr. HENNING. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what you have been covering in your discussion. I take it you have been discussing the provisions of that proposed resolution. Of course, we in our office are bombarded by the evidence of the suffering and difficulties of these people on the ships in the ports, and their prayers for relief, and it is evident that unless they are unloaded there will be a whole lot of suffering. People will be born on board ship if they are kept there for two or three weeks, or sent back, and then carried back again so as to get back on the 1st of July. They are congested and crowded on these ships unduly, and no one can tell what may be the result of some epidemic breaking out among the passengers, and what may happen to the poor victims of the greed and avarice of the steamship companies. Quoting Grover Cleveland, we are confronted by a condition, not a theory.

I take Mr. RAKER'S view somewhat, that the ship companies can be fined. I think from a hop, skip, and jump reading of that part of the law, which I do not deal with, that they can be fined when they bring an alien whom they know to be inadmissible, but you have got to bring to their knowledge that they knew when they started with him that he was inadmissible, and our boards make the findings when they have that sort of a case. We further find that this condition could have been known before the alien started, and that is the basis for the fine we impose on the steamship companies.

Mr. RAKER. Would there not be a little bit of evidence that they knew, if there are already landed 3,000 more than the quota provides, and if there are on the road 10,303?

Mr. HENNING. Of course, I take it you are a judge, and, after all, that becomes a question for a court ultimately, if we go to the limit, and just what the proof may be that can be adduced I do not know. It would be pretty hard to bring it home to them that they actually knew.

I notice that Congressman KLECZKA suggests that this condition will be repeated from month to month. I think there is this to be said in that regard: A great many people had the idea when this bill was passed, and people connected with the Immigration Department, who studied it closely, I assume, that in June you could bring 20 per cent of the yearly quota. Why that should have gotten out I do not know. There were men in my own office that had that idea, that the June quota would be the full 20 per cent quota. I do not doubt that the steamship companies probably knew better, but that would be a very resourceful defense.

Again, pages 105, 106, and 107:

Mr. RAKER. The astounding thing that has appeared before the committee this morning, to my mind, is what the Assistant Secretary has just given us a little while ago—that the Italian ambassador or the Polish ambassador were interested to find out how many of their people could come to this country. I understood all the time that those Governments were not inclined to have their nationals come to the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the Italian Government only?

Mr. HENNING. No; the Polish—it was the Polish, not the Italians, I was speaking of. Of course, there is some condition there that would explain that. I think perhaps you understand that Poland proper does not issue passports; at least, they are not granted to Poles. They are the Jewish residents of Poland who get passports, and it is more or less a race question, and Poland is trying to eliminate certain races from Poland.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not mean penalize in the legal sense. What I want to get at is that some ship undertakes to keep faith with the 3 per cent we have fixed and its virtue is its own reward. A ship that did not bring immigrants, knowing it would be beyond the quota, is a victim if we pass this legislation here about June 8. Now, then, if we should make 20 per cent apply for all June, any ship that has sailed or will sail can bring its immigrants up to 20 per cent, the same as they might do in July. Is not that the practical way of looking at this thing?

Mr. HENNING. When you talk about ships not taking cargo, I do not think there is a ship in a European port that is not being loaded.

The CHAIRMAN. With immigrants?

Mr. HENNING. Yes, sir. I do not think they are losing any time. It will take them nearly to the 1st of July to bring them here. There are only 20 days to the 1st of July, and they figure it will take them that to get across.

The CHAIRMAN. I am getting at the fairest way to do it, if we may do it. It must be clear to you that several of these ships undertook to treat these immigrants as common merchandise and beat this law.

Mr. HENNING. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Just the same as so much cargo of wool.

Mr. HENNING. The immigrant, as an innocent bystander, gets the worst of it.

Mr. BOX. The press carried quite a number of statements about how the department would have to deal with this. What is the idea of the department in dealing with them?

Mr. HENNING. Of course, the newspaper boys must have news stories. What I said was that in my judgment it could be handled under the emergency provision of the immigration law, which gives the Secretary of Labor power to land temporarily otherwise inadmissible aliens. He could admit those that are admissible under bond under the provisions of the immigration law, accept the percentage limitations temporarily for 30 days, or until the 1st of July or the 1st of August, and then by a blanket order admit them at that time and it would count against the quota of that month.

Mr. KLECZKA. In other words, Mr. Henning, you think that by an order they could be admitted under bond?

Mr. HENNING. Yes; the same as we admit individuals under bond who are otherwise inadmissible temporarily, and, as you will see, the regulation made in pursuance of that section contemplates an extraordinary situation—an emergency situation. It is a safety valve on the law of 1917, which provides for the temporary landing under bond on such regulations as may be provided for otherwise inadmissible aliens temporarily.

Mr. BOX. And you think that provision could be applied to this situation?

Mr. HENNING. I think it is a real emergency. I mean where the ships are in port and there is this situation. We are really up against a serious thing in several instances. I think it would be justifiable to consider that action.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Secretary, what would you do with that provision where they were just temporarily admitted, to be returned within a fixed time? Are those people coming here to be returned?

Mr. HENNING. Yes; and the order would be to be returned August 1.

Mr. BOX. You mean that they should be returned actually?

Mr. HENNING. No. But whenever that order is made, as, for example, take the case of trachoma—an eye disease—hospital treatment is permitted; and sometimes, instead of returning, they are admitted temporarily, to be returned, and in six or seven months, whatever the term is. At the end of that time a reexamination is permitted, and the alien who is then no longer under that disability is passed.

Mr. BOX. In that case you actually intend if a man does not get well to return him. In that case you intend to admit him if he gets well.

Mr. HENNING. Intend to return him if we find we can not admit him under the 3 per cent law. If we can admit him under the 3 per cent law, I think it is entirely within the clause of that law which was made to meet an emergency that involved great hardships.

Mr. RAKER. I will ask a question that involves that and following up what you have stated so clearly. Is it not your view as a practical proposition that the department should use its power as far as it can relieve the situation, if the emergency now exists, and that before the committee amends or attempts to amend the present existing act of May 19, 1921, that we should go on further and find out just how far and to what extent the violation of the law by the steamship companies was, so that we may know where we stand rather than throw up our hands to start with?

Mr. HENNING. Of course, that is a matter of policy.

Mr. RAKER. Is not that a pretty good policy?

Mr. HENNING. Sounds good to me.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the whole thing. I am sorry that I was not in at the moment he explained that. I remember the law, and I think Judge Wilson is familiar with the efforts to write it under Judge Burnett, that that particular provision was intended for an emergency coming down to individuals. It was not intended to be a blanket.

Mr. WILSON. Is this your clause of section 3, where it says that the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, shall issue rules and prescribe conditions, including the exaction of such bond as may be necessary for the control and regulation of the admission and return of otherwise inadmissible aliens applying for temporary admission?

Mr. HENNING. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, June 6, and on Friday, June 10, I proceeded to Ellis Island for the purpose of seeing what the status of affairs was there. I found hundreds of women and children who had arrived and who could not be landed on account of the fact that the act of May 19, 1921, which we passed here provided that only twenty-seven three hundred and sixty-fifths out of the 3 per cent could land in the month of June. When the Johnson bill was up on the floor of the House we provided 60 days' time in which to put the law into effect, but when this law was passed we provided 15 days of time, with the result that it has caused more suffering than the human mind can possibly conceive.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], who has just taken his seat, told us that 10,000,000 were on their way here or desirous of coming over. Why did he tell this House only a few weeks ago when the 3 per cent bill was under consideration that only 356,000 immigrants could come in one year if he believes the statements he made to-day. The truth of the matter is that the resolution which we are considering now does not permit a single additional immigrant more to enter than is provided in the act of May 19, 1921. All it does is to permit the entry of those who were on the high seas before June 8, and then provides that they shall be counted as part of the quota for the fiscal year commencing on July 1, 1921. When I was over at Ellis Island there were eight arrivals from Luxemburg, all mentally, morally, and physically fit to enter. The quota for June was seven, and so the question arose as to whether seven out of the eight were to be picked by lot in order to know who was to be permitted to land. The Secretary wisely determined to take advantage of the 1917 immigration act and admit one under bond.

Much is constantly said here about the immigrants coming from Italy. They always have done the real rough, hard work of the laborers to their own credit and to the benefit of our country. In the war they showed the real metal they were made up of. They fought and died for America as gallantly as did the native born. If some of the harping critics of Italy would learn something of her art, paintings, literature, and opera they would respect the men of Italy who come here to do their level best to help build up this country. The sooner we look at the kind of service men are giving the Republic and not at the place of their nativity, the quicker will we appreciate the good qualities which are to be found in the average individual.

Mr. Speaker, in April there was some discussion here as to what was being done in New York in our public schools, and an extract which appeared in Warsaw was read here, reading as follows:

Warsaw: Extracts from articles appearing in the press of Warsaw show that propaganda favoring unrestricted immigration is contemplated. According to these articles, this spring great celebrations will take place in New York with a view to showing in what measure immigrants took part in the general development of the country. A great exhibition will be opened in which different races will take part. The exhibition will attempt to prove that America has profited more from the immigrant than the immigrant from America.

Knowing there was no truth in the statements so contained and given wide publicity, I wrote to Dr. Ettinger, superintendent of New York's public schools, and this is what he answered:

BOARD OF EDUCATION, THE CITY OF NEW YORK,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT OF SCHOOLS,
April 27, 1921.

HON. ISAAC SIEGEL,
The House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I am returning herewith marked copy of report of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

I am also sending you a copy of my circular to all members of the teaching and supervising staff with reference to the celebration known as America's Making. I have marked several passages in this circular for ready reference. I think you will agree with me that it is a complete answer to the vicious statements contained in the articles appearing in the press of Warsaw.

Very respectfully, yours,
W. L. ETTINGER,
Superintendent of Schools.

The extracts to which he refers in his letter are as follows:

1. Resolution: The board of education "desires and directs that, under direction of the superintendent of schools, the pupils, the teachers, and the supervising staff contribute to the best of their ability that the enterprise, America's Making, may achieve its commendable and patriotic purpose."

2. Purpose: America's Making is a festival and exhibit celebrating the contributions of immigrant races to the development of this Republic from the earliest times to the present. It aims to impress the great idea of American unity and the broad meaning of the national motto "E pluribus unum." It designs to teach the later immigrant, as well as all people, his respectable share in our material and civic prosperity, to remove unbecoming condescension of earlier toward later immigrants, and to dislodge new immigrants' consciousness of such condescension. It aims to promote the civic equality proclaimed in the original document of our Nation, the Declaration, and emphasized by leading Americans from 1776 to 1921. It intends an increase in the spirit of brotherhood and good will; an abatement of racial animosities aroused by the World War. It proposes a closer relation between public education and the large problems of citizenship. It plans to promote a more perfect American Union, an increase in the blessings of peace, of prosperity, and of the general welfare.

7. Auspices: The celebration, promoted by the State and city departments of education, has the indorsement of the governor, the mayor, and a large committee of citizens. The managing committee, with offices at 7 West Sixteenth Street, is officered by Franklin K. Lane, honorary president; John H. Finley, president; W. L. Ettinger, vice president; Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, secretary; H. D. Walbridge, treasurer; John Daniels, general director. The office telephone is Chelsea 4594.

38. Only the American flag used: It has been agreed by the adult societies participating in the armory festival that no national flag other than the American will be displayed. This places no limit upon the national costumes used. Please observe this agreement in the school celebrations.

39. Salute to the flag: I recommend that the flag salute be made an impressive feature of each performance, and especially with the large masses of participants sent to the armory.

42. Good Americanism: Every program should surely impress the ideals of the best Americanism: Equality, brotherhood, mutual respect, tolerance, team play, unselfishness, public spirit, etc. The proponents of "America's making" request us to remember that what America has done for the immigrant has been stressed so much that what valuable gifts the immigrant has brought America is to be made prominent in this festival.

43. Education of the community to an understanding of school service: This occasion offers an opportunity too valuable to be slighted for impressing upon our public the value and variety of the service rendered by schools. Especially the school's recognition of the value of all children and its welcome to them and its democracy for them should be illustrated.

56. Interesting to parents: I am sure experience has taught you that the schools are the nation's most potent influence upon the homes of the people. As I have frequently reminded you, the children can be made treasure bearers of a generous enthusiasm for the best in American life. Let me urge upon you to encourage the children to tell frequently at home what they are doing in this project and why, also to enlist the cooperation of the parents in answering the question, What worth-while things have the different races contributed to America's making?

Mr. Speaker, one should be careful in what he says here in debate, because the day the remarks are carried in the press they are read very frequently by readers who may never see the refutation. This House by its action to-day is placing itself on record as being prepared to rectify its errors whenever made, and those who vote against this resolution do so because they refuse to see the light and to answer humanity's call.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I hope the House membership will look at this proposition fairly. The measure is meritorious and it is necessary. I doubt if I have heard any short speech in my eight years' service here which contained as many imaginative statements as the one delivered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] who just preceded me. He described a situation with which this resolution has nothing to do. This bill does not admit a single solitary one of the great numbers of alien people tending this way. We passed the 3 per cent bill to halt them. We do not reopen the gates. We correct a situation without disturbing the totals.

We still believe in restriction. We want more restriction, or, rather, both control and restriction, of all immigration. We have a right to do all we can to make the 3 per cent bill as workable as possible with the least friction, cutting out this unnecessary hardship to 6,000 or 8,000 aliens who are caught in the June rush. We admit them and deduct the numbers from future quotas.

Some one asked from whence they came. The principal excess is from Italy. Others come from countries where the quotas were very small. Albania and Czechoslovakia, which have small annual quotas, sent small excess in June. Eight aliens arrived from Luxemburg. The quota for June was 7, and no one could say who should be the odd person to be sent back. And there are Portugal, Rumania, eastern Asia, and perhaps one or two other countries with small excess of quotas for June. The whole total that will come in as the June excess will be about 8,000, and they will be counted in the quotas of the new fiscal year but not in the month of July. You will find an amendment added to this bill by the committee which provides that the 20 per cent maximum is properly retained, so that the 20 per cent will mean 20 per cent less the June overflow admitted by this resolution. The number of aliens to be admitted in the full year is 355,000, and no more. The steamship companies have not made any special appeal for this bill; the big appeal comes from many Congressmen and is requested by the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Labor. The latter, it is true, has taken advantage of a clause in the previous law and has set ashore women and little children, expectant mothers and sick people, and the like of that, and numerous others, all under bond.

To pass this act saves the United States the expense of examining every one of these people at some future time with a view to deporting them. This act will avoid unnecessary hardship, it will save the Government money, it will relieve the Bureau of Immigration, and it will not upset the 3 per cent restriction by so much as a single Polish boy or one Italian baby.

I might add a little information gained since the hearings were closed. The steamship lines are making a real effort to keep within the quotas. They have cabled all agents to refuse tickets to aliens who apply in other than their native countries. That is causing migrating aliens to bank up in some ports which are assembly places for mixed travel, but there are no tickets for them, because the steamships in order to be sure that quotas are not exceeded in the future must prorate the business. There are reasons, and good reasons, for this bill; there are good reasons for the steps taken by Secretary Davis, but these reasons will not apply on August 1 or September 1.

And, Mr. Speaker, when the fiscal year is up—a year from this 30th of June—there will be no banking up, for unless we pass some substitute for the present temporary 3 per cent restriction measure the bars will be down and aliens will be flowing in from all central Europe, as they would be now, not a few thousand per month but 70,000, 80,000, or 100,000, no matter whether times here happened to be good or bad. We did well to order the restriction; we do well to correct the flaw caused by the June quota having no flexibility; we will do well to start work at once on a permanent, selective, and restrictive bill, with Uncle Sam's original inquiry on the other side of the water.

Mr. Speaker, no man of my generation has worked harder for restriction of immigration. I have been at it for 20 years, a dozen years before I was honored with election to Congress. We have got something. We have restricted immigration heavily. We have established the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the United States is no longer the asylum for all the rest of the world. The dumping-ground game is played out. The melting pot is going to have a chance to fuse the material now on hand. We have gone far for the future good of the United States, I feel sure. For the part I have taken in securing these restrictions I have been derided and lampooned in many newspapers and in certain high-brow magazines. I have been called the "champion alien hater." The deportations of Emma Goldman, Alexander Berkman, and others, which deportations I urged, have been called "banishments." I have even been called a "Jew baiter," and all that. I know I am none of these things. I have neither malice nor hatred for any race, any people, any person; but, Mr. Speaker, when I discover something in our immigration laws as we progress with them that need correction, I hope I may always have the courage to come before the Congress with a request for legislation to make the correction. And Congress will grant relief, I think. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 43.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the record shows there is not a quorum present, and I object to the vote on that ground, and make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman objects to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present. There is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. As many as are in favor of suspending the rules and passing the resolution will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 189, nays 71, answered "present" 1, not voting 169, as follows:

So, two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. COLLIER with Mr. TREADWAY.

Mr. WOODYARD with Mr. POU.

Mr. BACHARACH with Mr. STEDMAN.

Mr. TAYLOR of New Jersey with Mr. TEN EYCK.

Mr. CONNELL with Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. ROSSDALE with Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Pennsylvania with Mr. BRINSON.

Mr. BUTLER with Mr. DEAL.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. LINTHICUM.

Mr. FAUST with Mr. MOORE of Virginia.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I have a standing pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY. I voted "no." I wish to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks upon the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, is it the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. MALONEY. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. And I make the same request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington and the gentleman from Mississippi make the same request. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Unless it is confined to their own remarks, I shall object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. These are extensions of remarks made this afternoon; extensions and revisions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DENISON, for three days, on account of important official business;

To Mr. ROSENBLOOM (at the request of Mr. GOODYKOONTZ), for four days, on account of official business;

To Mr. FROTHINGHAM, on account of death in his family; and

To Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, for 10 days, on account of official business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. To submit a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that after the conclusion of business in order to-morrow it may be in order to take up bills unobjected to on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and to consider them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that at the close of the business in order to-morrow it may be in order to take up business on the Unanimous Consent Calendar that is not objected to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the request of the gentleman from Wyoming include bills which went over to-day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands the request.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The bills are to be called up day after to-morrow again?

Mr. MONDELL. I will modify my request—to begin at the point where we left off consideration to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming modifies his request and asks that at the close of the business in order to-morrow it may be in order to take up bills on the Unanimous Consent Calander that are unobjected to, beginning at the point in the Unanimous Consent Calendar where we left off to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if this will clear the way so that it will expedite the consideration of the tariff bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, we expect to be so busy in the consideration of the tariff bill in the very near future that it is rather important that these minor bills of some consequence to some gentlemen on both sides should be disposed of before the tariff bill reaches us.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, the minority, of course, never desire to interfere with the program as arranged by the majority, which is responsible, but I want to state to the gentleman from Wyoming that there is growing up from this side a very great anxiety to take a look at that tariff bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I will state to the gentleman that that is natural, as some one suggests, and there is a disposition on this side to be curious, at least, and interested. We realize, however, that the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means are working very diligently, very constantly, very earnestly, and we hope and trust very wisely and intelligently, in preparing the bill for our consideration.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, I know the gentleman from Wyoming is very modest and does not mean to hold out a hope that possibly he may not be able to live up to; but proceeding on the assumption that this is to clear the way for the tariff bill, and also on the assumption that only unanimous-consent bills will be in order and no suspensions, I think there will be no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object, but——

Mr. MONDELL. I thought the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] had asked all the questions there were. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. What does the gentleman mean by "the near future"?

Mr. MONDELL. That depends somewhat upon the gentleman who interprets that term.

Mr. GARNER. I want the gentleman from Wyoming to interpret that term of "the near future."

Mr. MONDELL. Out in my country when the Indians want to refer to something that is quite near they say "mee-teet-se." If it is a little farther away they say "mee-teet-se," and if it is very far away it is "mee-teet-se," with a somewhat different intonation. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Can the gentleman interpret that as the near future? How many days?

Mr. MONDELL. I said promptly and without hesitation "in the near future."

Mr. GARNER. But let me get the gentleman down to some exact information for the House.

Mr. MONDELL. It will be about the first of the month.

Mr. GARNER. About how many days does the gentleman think it will be?

Mr. MONDELL. About the first of the month.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 21, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

170. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Starlings Creek, Va., and channel to and connecting said creek with Pocomoke Sound; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 21, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father and our God, we bless Thee that Thou art so accessible, no far-away deity but near to us, so that the breathings of our souls are understood and interpreted by Thee. Mercifully direct our ways this day, and so help us to live that the record shall be acceptable in Thy sight. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 34) creating a commission to represent the United States in the celebration of the first centennial of the proclamation of the independence of the Republic of Peru.

The message also announced that the House had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 4976. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Trumbull Steel Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio;

H. R. 5756. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands," approved August 29, 1916;

H. R. 6573. An act to further reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, and for other purposes;

H. R. 6877. An act to permit a compact or agreement between the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming respecting the disposition and apportionment of the waters of the Colorado River, and for other purposes;

H. J. Res. 112. Joint resolution authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to employees of the United States Department of Agriculture who died in the war with Germany; and

H. J. Res. 153. Joint resolution permitting the admission of certain aliens who sailed from foreign ports on or before June 8, 1921, and for other purposes.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR VETERANS OF WORLD WAR.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to give notice at this time that on Thursday morning next, immediately after the close of the routine morning business, I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit some remarks on the bill (S. 506) to provide adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War, and for other purposes, with the intent at that time, as clearly as I can, to call attention to the provisions of the bill and the reasons which actuated the Committee on Finance in reporting it favorably to the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CURTIS presented resolutions of the pastor and congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Arlington, and the Hebrew congregation of Wichita, both in the State of Kansas, favoring the calling of an international disarmament conference, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Independence, Kans., praying that relief be afforded the imperiled people of the Near East, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the Brooks Elevator Co., of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation imposing a tariff duty on blackstrap molasses, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Public School Defense League, of Flint, Mich., commending the recent speech of Rear Admiral William S. Sims in England in relation to conditions in Ireland and favoring free speech without reservations, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution of Edgewood Grange, No. 1970, Patrons of Husbandry, of Tiro, Ohio, opposing the so-called Ralston-Nolan bill, placing a 1 per cent Federal tax on all real estate in excess of $10,000 valuation, and also the enactment of a sales or turnover tax law, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution of the Kansas State League of Local Building and Loan Associations, of Topeka, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation exempting domestic building and loan associations from income tax where the income derived by a member from savings in shares does not exceed $500, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of the pastor and congregation of the Church of the Brethren, of Sabetha; the congregation of the First Church of Brethren, of Conway; and a resolution adopted by a mass meeting of citizens at Rose Hill on June 13, 1921; all in the State of Kansas, favoring the calling of an international disarmament conference, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Independence and Ada, Kans., praying that relief be afforded the imperiled people of the Near East, particularly of Armenia, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Linn, Kans., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Memphis, Tenn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for physical education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution of sundry citizens of Greenleaf and Linn, Kans., favoring the recognition of the Irish republic, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD four telegrams on the subject of the pending coal bill, including the names.

There being no objection, the telegrams, with the names, were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., June 17, 1921.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

For reasons with which you are familiar all coal interests in this section are naturally very much opposed to governmental regulation as expressed in the Frelinghuysen bill, No. 1807, which I understand comes up for action to-day. It is estimated that we have represented in Nashville $100,000,000 in the coal industry. I hope you can find it consistent to vote against this bill.

WM. H. LINDSEY,
President Crescent Coal Co.

MEMPHIS, TENN., June 20, 1921.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We vigorously protest the passage of Senate bill 1806, being the so-called Frelinghuysen coal industry stabilization bill. We view with alarm the constantly menacing encroachment of the Government in essentially private industries. The public is already amply safeguarded by National and State legislation preventing combination in restraint of trade or price fixing. As your constituents we urge that you register your most vigorous protests against the passage of this law. We will always cooperate with the Government and furnish freely any information or statistics needed.

W. T. C. Berlin, C. S. Eberhart, M. S. Lemman, M. A. Whitten, J. H. Rudisill, W. J Prescott, Pettus Davis, J. J. Darragh, J. P. Ridgeway, M. W. Connelly, F. W. Billingsley, Guy S. Turner, R. G. Watkins, C. S. Page, L. S. Laws.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., June 21, 1921.

Hon. KENNETH McKELLAR,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

I am relying upon you to oppose the passage of the Frelinghuysen Senate bill 1807. Its enactment would mean chaos in the mining industry in this State, which employs approximately 8,000 persons, all of whom would be adversely affected. It is an attempt to establish Government control over private industry, the beginning of Government paternalism that will stifle initiative and become a blight upon further progress. It is an altogether unnecessary measure as well as a violation of constitutional guaranties. A large number of mines in this State are now down for lack of market; others operating at a loss. I feel sure that you are opposed to any form of Government control which would add to the cost of production and that you will oppose this measure because it is unnecessary and un-American in principle, and I believe and hope you will vigorously oppose its enactment.

L. I. COLEMAN.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., June 21, 1921.

Senator KENNETH D. McKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

We are relying upon you to oppose the passage of Frelinghuysen Senate bill 1807. In your State there are substantially 150 coal-mining operations with an aggregate investment of more than $15,000,000, employing substantially 10,000 persons that would be adversely affected by such a law. The measure is manifestly an attempt to establish governmental control over private industry, generally the beginning of Government paternalism that stifles initiative and is a blight upon further progress and is an altogether unnecessary measure as well as a violation of constitutional guaranties. Senator FRELINGHUYSEN evidently knows that the inexorable law of supply and demand is gradually assuming control not only of coal but all other commodities, and no doubt conceives that his bill, if enacted, will give him credit for lowering prices, which are now, wages considered, relatively lower than prewar prices. At present time 70 per cent of coal operations in your State are operating at a loss. I feel sure that you are opposed to any form of Government control which would add further to the cost of production, and that your interest in the welfare of your constituents, together with the unnecessary and un-American principle involved in this measure, will justify your vigorous opposition to its enactment.

JOHN L. BOYD.

DECLINE IN PRICE AND PURCHASING POWER OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have received from the Secretary of Agriculture a table showing the purchasing power of farm products as of the 1st of May, 1921, compared with the price and purchasing power of certain other staple articles. I wish to read just a few of these figures to the Senate before having the table printed in the RECORD.

The index price for May, 1921, is based upon its relation to the prices of May, 1913, which is the average for the five years preceding, so that the May 1, 1913, price is used as 100.

Lumber, as compared with the index price of 100, is 182. The purchasing power of farm products, the 10 leading crops, expressed in terms of lumber, is 59.3 as compared with its purchasing power based on the 5-year average.

Steel is 143, and the purchasing power of farm products, as compared May 1 with the 100 per cent basis of 1913, is 75.9.

Petroleum to-day is 194.6, as compared with the prewar price, and the purchasing power of farm products in terms of petroleum is 56.

Coal is now 220, and the purchasing power of farm products, expressed in coal, is 49.4. Anthracite is 192.7, and the purchasing power of farm products, expressed in anthracite, is 56.5.

Cotton goods, bleached sheeting, is 277.3, and cotton, raw (Texas), 79, as compared with the prewar basis of 100, and its present purchasing power is 28.4 as expressed in terms of bleached sheeting.

Shoes are 232 per cent, and hides 77 per cent, and the purchasing power of hides, expressed in terms of shoes, as is explained here in a footnote, is 33.2.

Freight rates are 180, and the purchasing power of farm products expressed in terms of freight, as compared with the prewar basis, is 60.

Railway wages are 252, and the purchasing power of farm products expressed in railway wages all included is 43.2.

Coal mines 204.4, and the purchasing power is 53 per cent.

As to all commodities except farm and food products, the purchasing power, as compared to the prewar basis, is 157, and the purchasing power of farm products is 69.4 as of date of May 1, 1921.

The Secretary then gives a list of corn, oats, wheat, barley, and so forth, running down through the whole list of things produced on the farm, and gives the five-year average before the war for the same month, the price index for the five-year average before the war as 100, and the purchasing power for the five-year average before the war as 100, and compares the purchasing power now with that situation.

We find corn on May 1 was 59 and a fraction cents per bushel, as compared with 64.7 cents per bushel, or a purchasing power of 92, before the war and now a purchasing power of 59.

Oats were 36.8 cents on May 1, the five-year average was 41 cents; the purchasing power for the five-year average before the war was 80 and the present purchasing power is 57.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. In order that we may understand the basis of the table, will the Senator inform us whether the retail or wholesale price of the articles is taken as the basis of the computation?

Mr. SMITH. This was sent to me by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, and on the last page I see he refers to the wholesale price:

> The general wholesale price level of all commodities for April as given by the Bureau of Labor is 57 per cent above the 5-year average before the war. This method of calculation eliminates questions of season, for in all cases May prices are compared with May prices, etc. The purchasing power is the price index divided by the general price level of all commodities. If a farm product had a price index of 157, its purchasing power would be 100; that is, exactly the same as it was before the war.

So that the Secretary is taking the wholesale price and giving the general average, which, in place of being 157 compared with the prewar average, is 69 for all farm products.

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely desire to say to the Senator that there is such an enormous spread between wholesale prices and retail prices of the ordinary manufactured products as contradistinguished from food or farm products that the divergence would be almost double even what is given there.

Mr. SMITH. I think the Senator is well within a conservative estimate. Heaven knows this is bad enough.

I note that the purchasing power of beef cattle is 71. I note that the purchasing power of a horse raised on the farm is 43. I wish to have these tables, which have been computed by an expert, incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 27, 1921.

METHODS OF COMPUTATION USED.

The latest month is for either May 1 or April 15, as indicated. The figures are from the Monthly Crop Reporter for May, 1921.

The 5-year average before the war is calculated from reports of the Bureau of Crop Estimates for the same months for five successive years ending with 1914.

The price index is the present price divided by the 5-year average before the war.

The general wholesale price level of all commodities for April as given by the Bureau of Labor is 57 per cent above the 5-year average before the war.

This method of calculation eliminates questions of season, for in all cases May prices are compared with May, etc.

The purchasing power is the price index divided by the general price level of all commodities. If a farm product had a price index of 157, its purchasing power would be 100; that is, exactly the same as it was before the war.

G. F. WARREN.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, while I am on my feet I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the last three market days the price of raw cotton has declined about $10 a bale, or 2 cents a pound. I have a telegram here from the president of the American Cotton Association, Mr. J. S. Wannamaker, received this morning, indicating a condition that should attract the attention of every Senator and call for his earnest cooperation to avert what is an inevitable disaster unless some aid is given. It is needless for me to attempt to tell the Senate the importance of the cotton industry to America's welfare. Yet here is this article, upon which every nation on the globe depends for the clothing of the great masses of the people, and for its supply depends upon America, that is 50 per cent below the cost of production. Banks have extended their paper as long as they can extend it. Merchants have this year gone practically on a hand-to-mouth policy, and yet here in June is the incoming crop practically cut 50 per cent and the price of it declining to where the banks of the country, unless they get relief, will be forced into liquidation and a panic will ensue the like of which the country has never seen. We can not arbitrarily wipe out $1,000,000,000 of credit, and this is the average commercial value of the cotton crop of the South, or $1,000,000,000 of hard cash, without there being precipitated a crisis that every man would be appalled even to contemplate.

Here are our rediscounts held almost at the same level, barring one or two districts, that existed during the peak of the call for deflation. Here is our gold reserve piling up every day, now approximately 56 per cent, when only 42 per cent is required under the law. Here they are boasting of the fact that our reserves in the Federal reserve system are higher than they ever were before, the world burning up and they boasting of the fact that there is more water in the tank than ever before. What would the Senate think if the city of Washington were to catch fire, was burning up, and we called the fire department to account for the disaster, and they were to coolly admit that they had not used a hydrant, had not used any hose, and boasting that they had more water in the tank than they had ever had before?

What is our financial system for if it is not to come to the relief of distressed commerce in the situation that now confronts us, tending toward an appalling disaster? Why could not the rate of discount, based upon staple and nonperishable products of the farm, be lowered, the farm paper renewed, the time extended, and these people relieved until such time as the market may be adjusted and the normal flow of trade be resumed? It is the paramount duty of the Senate to investigate the financial situation, ascertain where the wrong is, and heroically apply the remedy. Is it possible that by the passage of the Federal reserve act we created a frankenstein that is to destroy us, or did we create the Federal reserve system to meet just such an emergency as now confronts the basic industry of this country—agriculture?

I sat in a conference only a few days ago which met to frame a plan for the relief of the cattlemen of this country. Prominent financiers were present. It did not take very long for them to realize the situation, nor did it take them long to agree to underwrite $50,000,000 worth of paper and to present it to the Federal Reserve Board for rediscount in order to relieve that situation. I cooperated heartily with the cattlemen. The meat supply of the country was jeopardized by these very terrible conditions. Now the clothing industry, America's monopoly, is being jeopardized, and there is no relief in sight.

It is a fact, which is officially stated, that the reserves of our Federal reserve system are greater than they have ever been in its history. The Federal reserve banks are boasting that they have $2,400,000,000 of gold and have a larger deposit on hand than ever before in the history of the system, while the people are going bankrupt and are starving. We sit here in the Senate responsible for having put the banking interests of America in the hands of seven men.

Senators may argue as they please, they may speak as they please, but the fact remains that the banking interests of America are lodged wholly in the hands of the seven men who compose the board of governors of the Federal reserve system. That board fixes the rate of discount; they can determine where credit shall be extended and where it shall not be extended

Therefore, Mr. President, I am going to read to the Senate a portion of the telegram to which I have referred. I am going to ask the powers that be, first, if relief may be given outside of legislation? If it can not be so given, we should address ourselves here in this body to framing such legislation as shall make a recurrence of the present condition impossible in the future. We can do it; it is our duty to do it. We can not say that the Government should not go into the banking business, for the Government has already gone into the banking business, and to-day the policy of the United States Government must of necessity be the policy of the banking interests of this country. The telegram reads, in part, as follows:

> I urge you immediately canvass leaders Senate and through strong committee lay true condition confronting South before President, stating unless governmental relief immediately extended means absolute certainty complete financial crisis seriously affecting not only agriculture but every line of business in South and have far-reaching effect upon business entire Nation. Will result in even closing schools and colleges of South. Insist that necessary governmental relief be extended immediately in interest of South and Nation or that he state positively no such relief can be extended.

Now, reading another part of his telegram, it is suggested:

Mr. President, I know it will be answered to that telegram that a statement has already gone forth from the Federal Reserve Board, and that they are asking the banks in the agricultural districts through the member banks and the nonmember banks to extend what relief they can; but if the Federal Reserve Board would issue a statement that the rate of rediscount is to be lowered to 5 per cent or less, and that those districts that have a plethora of money would be urged to take these securities, renew their loans, extend the time, and let the statement go broadcast over the country that the resources of the Federal reserve system have come to the rescue of bankrupt and ruined agriculture, it would be the greatest force for good that could possibly be exerted at this time.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, assuming for the sake of the argument that the Federal Reserve Board should reduce the rate of discount to 5 per cent, what assurance should we have that the borrower would get the benefit of that? We know, of course, that the local banks would get the benefit; but what assurance would we have that the rates would be reduced to the borrower?

Mr. SMITH. My experience with the banker throughout the agricultural region is that he is more than willing to give to his patrons whatever benefit may accrue to him in the way of lowering of rediscount rates. I remember in 1914, when the terrible calamity struck us by virtue of the World War, unexpectedly disrupting all the channels of trade and demoralizing business, when the Secretary of the Treasury issued his statement that Government funds would be used temporarily to relieve the situation by lending to the banks at 5 per cent, with the understanding that the banks handling the loans should not charge in excess of 1 per cent in addition thereto, every bank in my State accepted the proposition.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I had occasion to go into this subject a few months ago, and I found that there were 10 States in the Union in which the legal rate of interest was 12 per cent, and that there were 12 States in the Union in which the legal rate of interest was 10 per cent. It seems to me that if the legislatures of the several States would get busy and reduce those rates of interest down to reasonable rates, such action on their part would give more direct relief to the local people.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have not the shadow of a doubt that if the Federal Reserve Board, which is the omnipotent power in the banking world to-day, were to issue a statement that in all agricultural districts where distress prevails—and it prevails in all of them—they would accept properly executed farm paper upon a basis of rediscount of 5 per cent, there is not a banker in this Union, regardless of the State rate, who would not accept it at cost to relieve the situation. If the Federal reserve system, as we have been advised by the comptroller, has earned something over 100 per cent upon rediscount rates of 6 and 7 per cent, and their reserves now are larger than ever before, why, in the name of reason, can they not lower the rediscount rate in order to save a disastrous condition and to bring relief to the people? Have we come to the point in our country's affairs that the banks of the country are a sacred institution that must jeopardize nothing, although the country goes into bankruptcy and ruin and the farming industry be paralyzed?

I state here and now, without fear of successful contradiction, that, in view of the condition in which the stock raisers, the woolgrowers, and the cotton growers, and the raisers of general farm products find themselves, with the very best treatment from now on it will take them half a generation to recover not only from the actual losses which they have incurred but from the consequent psychological lack of confidence in their Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Federal reserve banks decide to reduce the rates on rediscount to 5 per cent, could not they provide conditions whereby the benefit thus accruing could be extended to the borrower? In other words, that it should only apply to those banks that made not more than a certain profit out of the transaction?

Mr. SMITH. They could under the general powers granted by the Federal reserve act. The Federal Reserve Board could issue an order to the effect that as to certain paper rediscounted at 5 per cent discounting banks would only get that rediscount upon the condition that they did not charge more than a certain additional percentage for the primary discount.

The conditions now are calling for this kind of relief. How do Senators suppose the citizens of this country who toil in the fields from 12 to 14 hours a day to produce the food and clothing of the Nation feel when they pick up the balance sheet of the Comptroller of the Currency and see that our reserve is greater than ever before, and that the resources of our banks are larger than ever before, while the country is bankrupt and facing ruin?

If we can not meet the situation, I hope and trust to God that the people will have sense enough to send men here who can meet it and make it impossible for a condition like that which now confronts us ever again to arise. It does not behoove us to sit here and say that this is a world condition. That may be true so far as war-ridden Europe is concerned, but America never felt the tread of a foreign foot, nor did she ever hear the sound of an enemy's gun. She financed the world during the war, and now can not finance her own people during times of peace and reconstruction.

Mr. President, I have said this much. I hope that the conference that we are to have immediately in reference to this subject will result in preparing and providing some kind of immediate relief, and I trust that every Senator in this body will join hands with the distressed people in my section, who produce that out of which the balance of trade of America has been made, to see that their great industry is not utterly destroyed.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in line with what the Senator from South Carolina has just said. I contributed as best I could to bringing about an arrangement by which the cattlemen could be relieved of the distress in which they found themselves. I rejoice that arrangements have been made to relieve them of the terrible condition that is upon them.

Mr. President, it is absolutely necessary, as I have said before, for the Government to take a hand in bringing about relief to the farmers, merchants, and bankers of the cotton-growing States. There is serious distress in that section. Our farmers, merchants, and bankers, who were doing business and fairly prosperous on a 40-cent basis for cotton, have seen that price tumble down and down until it has reached the low and unprofitable price of 12 cents per pound. That price is far below the cost of production. Our farmers had borrowed money on cotton, and were holding it for a better price. While they were doing that the cotton exchanges were gambling in futures, selling short, not making delivery of cotton, merely selling the name of cotton, and beating down the price of that which the farmer was holding in the hope that the price would go back and that he could obtain a price that would at least cover the cost of production.

Mr. President, this is a serious situation that confronts our people. Let me get this situation clearly in your minds. A farmer holding 20 bales of cotton has borrowed money on it, and he is hoping to see the price advance so that he can get back the money he has expended in producing it, and get a little profit if possible. Now, then, behold the cotton exchanges getting all the money that the bear gamblers want. Not a dollar has been withheld from them. They have obtained all the money they needed to beat down the price of wheat, corn, and cotton. Somehow they are enabled to raise every dollar they want when it is for the purpose of beating down the price of farm products; but how about those who are on the bull side? They can not obtain any money, and therefore they do not go upon the exchanges, and the bear speculators are simply offering this stuff for sale and fake bidders are going through the farcical performance of pretending to buy. Frequently the same fellow who sold to-day buys to-morrow, and it is a wash-sale game that they have. No cotton is delivered. The producer is not called on for cotton with which to fill the contract, and the spinner has no cotton delivered to him.

Senators, that is the situation you have going on to-day in the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges. It can not be defended and should not be tolerated.

Let me read you a notice that appeared in the Washington Post this morning:

There was a continuation of the recent selling movement in the cotton market, which carried prices into new low ground for the session during to-day's trading. October contracts, for instance, sold off to 11.22, making a net decline of 83 points and a break of over 2⅝ cents per pound as compared with the high price touched on the bullish crop conditions of last month.

A decline in price of nearly $15 a bale, while the farmer is holding his cotton and refusing to sell at the already low price prevailing. They have beaten down the price nearly $15 a bale by a few men walking upon the floor of the exchange and saying, "I will sell 500 bales of July or August" at so much, while others repeat, "I will take it." Then this farcical performance is reported in the columns of these papers that there is a heavy selling movement and the price has gone down. What sort of a selling movement was it? There was no sale or delivery of cotton. They have no cotton; they do not handle real cotton, and yet the papers say that there is a selling movement on, when nothing is sold and nothing delivered, and nothing but the name of cotton is dealt in by men who use this fictitious stuff to beat down the price of cotton. Again I call upon the Government to compel the cotton exchanges to sell and deliver real cotton and comply with the law or close their doors at once.

Mr. President, this organized raid of bear gamblers on the cotton exchanges, with no resisting power on the part of the cotton producer, is like stabbing a crippled man bound hand and foot and prone upon the ground. Unless the cotton exchange is helpful and of service to both the producer and spinner, there is no excuse for its existence. During the World War the President suspended the operation of the grain exchanges, and it may be that the cotton exchanges should now be closed.

Mr. President, I want to present another phase of the cotton question. Suppose a man comes up and borrows money on cotton at 20 cents a pound when the price was higher than that. The bear gambler comes and beats the price down to 19 cents, then to 18 cents, and so on, and the banker says, "Why, the price of your produce is lower than it was when you borrowed the money on it, and I must insist that you pay your loan. The borrower says, "Why, I can not do it. Two bales of cotton now would not pay what one would a few days ago"; but the miserable game goes on.

I tell you, Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina is right. Something has got to be done to lift the business of the cotton-growing States out of the mire of distress and gloom to which it has descended. The Government will run no risk. Cotton is as good as gold. It is the only product in the country every pound of which is converted into money. Every dollar's worth of it contributes to the wealth of the Nation. Now, what risk do we run by the Government going to the rescue of the cotton industry, as it has gone to the rescue of the cattle industry? I rejoice that our cattlemen are going to be taken care of, and the cotton producers are entitled to the same character of relief.

If the Federal Reserve Board will not act in the interest of the great agricultural army of the country, as it does act in the interest of Wall Street every time it crooks its finger, I call upon the Congress to go upon record as ordering it to act.

Where does the Federal Reserve Board get the power to arrogate to itself the right to gather up the gold supply and sit on it while the cry of distress is ringing around the country? The illustration of the Senator from South Carolina is the aptest thing that I have ever heard—a city burning down, and the fire department sitting back with folded arms, not coming to extinguish the flames, but boasting, when the conflagration is ended, "We have more water in our tanks than we ever had before." How ridiculous!

Mr. President, I want to serve notice on the Federal Reserve Board that unless it shows more consideration for the business of agriculture than it is now doing I am going to be forced to come upon this floor and discuss something that I know about the lending of the people's money to certain interests in Wall Street.

Mr. President, J. Pierpont Morgan, the older Morgan, now deceased, once said, "If you give me control of the credit of the country I care not who makes your laws," and he was right. The concern that controls the credit of the country has the power of life and death over the business of the country.

I make the assertion here to-day that there is more money in the United States at this hour than ever before in the history of the country, and yet the channels of circulation are choked, stopped up. This money is not permitted to go where it can serve the needs of the people and relieve them of dire distress. The Government will not let you or me coin money. If it did, you would coin all you wanted to, and so would I, but the Government reserves that right to itself; and when it does, the Government ought to see to it that nobody can corner it or control it so that it will not flow out into the legitimate channels of business. If partiality or favoritism is shown by the Federal Reserve Board one business will be helped and another hurt.

Look at what we have done for the cattle people, and that is proper. If the Government had not come in, they would not have been relieved, and the cattle industry would probably have been destroyed in the United States while we were sitting here in session in both branches of Congress. Now since we have gone to the rescue of that situation, let us go to the rescue of the agricultural industry. Should we sit back and permit a few people to control the instrumentalities of the Government to the detriment, injury, and ruin of millions of people?

Here is the farmer down here, who responded to the call of his country in the hour of its peril. He produced in abundance as the Government called on him to produce. He sent his boys to the battle front. Some of them are sleeping in France to-day; others are wounded here in our hospitals, or back home. There he is now with his produce on his hands, worth hundreds of dollars a few months ago, now a drug on the market. Why? Because he can not be aided so that he can hold it for a price that will yield a profit.

The Old World is yearning for our produce. If this Government will extend credit, they will buy our goods and pay us for them with money loaned by this Government. We can extend these credits. We are the richest Nation in the world. We have here in America half the wealth of the world, and yet here we are with the farmers of the West and the farmers of the South crying out in their distress for deliverance from conditions that grip and hold them in the throes of financial disaster. Senators, the people do not understand why we do not relieve the situation. They know that we are the richest Nation in the world. They know that we can relieve them, and they wonder why we do not. That is the truth of it. I am not speaking of normal times and rules for business in ordinary times, but I am speaking of a people who rallied to the call of their country and saved it in the hour of its distress, and now suffer from the evil effects of the aftermath of that Great War. I am calling on the country to come to their rescue and save them and their business from poverty and ruin.

Senators, we owe it to them; and I trust, as the Senator from South Carolina has said, that we will wake up to a full realization of the fact that something has to be done or you are going to have a panic in this country. Some people may think that a panic in the South will not affect you. It will affect the East, the North, and the West. We buy your automobiles. We buy your buggies, your wagons, implements, and machinery. We are your customers in various lines. We buy grain, meat, and mules from the West, so whenever you strike down the purchasing power of the South you hurt the whole country. If a panic grips the South, its evil influence will be felt in the other sections of our great country.

So, Senators, I appeal to you, in the name of thirty-odd millions of people in the cotton-growing States, to join us in extending relief to those who are greatly embarrassed and sorely distressed because they can not obtain the money necessary to carry on their business. The Government has it in its power to relieve this situation, and I pray that it will see the necessity for immediate action.

PROTECTION OF TIMBER IN OREGON AND CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on the 13th day of this month I introduced Senate bill 2084. The purpose of that measure is to make appropriation for the prevention of loss of timber from insect infestations on reserved and unreserved public lands in Oregon and California. Through inadvertence the bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I think properly it should go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, because there is a provision in the annual Agricultural appropriation act which deals with this situation. I ask that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the Senator defer his request until the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations can be here or I can consult with him about it. I do not know that he has any desire to retain the bill in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McNARY. I would like to comply with the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas, but this is emergency legislation, and should properly go promptly to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I am sure the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would not have any objection to the change of reference.

Mr. CURTIS. Very well; I withdraw my suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the change of reference requested by the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 80, directing the Committee on Education and Labor to investigate the recent acts of violence in the coal fields of West Virginia and adjacent territory and the causes which led to the conditions which now exist in said territory.

Mr. CURTIS. I make a point of order against that. No such motions are in order during this part of the morning hour. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SMOOT. It will take just a few minutes to get through with the morning business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The morning business has not been disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of business is the presentation of petitions and memorials. The Senator from Kansas makes a point of order that the motion of the Senator from California is not in order at this time, as the Chair understands it. The Chair is in some doubt about it, but is inclined to sustain the point of order.

Mr. CURTIS. I demand the regular order now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further petitions or memorials, reports of committees are next in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1168) to authorize the payment of certain taxes to Stevens and Ferry Counties, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 136); and

A bill (S. 2022) promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians of the Mescalero Reservation, in New Mexico (Rept. No. 137).

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1894) to amend section 26 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs," and so forth, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report (No. 138) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 513) granting a deed of quitclaim and release to J. L. Holmes of certain land in the town of Whitefield, Okla. (Rept. No. 139);

A bill (S. 902) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands in Arizona, New Mexico, or California," approved March 4, 1913 (Rept. No. 140);

A bill (S. 1732) for the relief of Mrs. Benjamin Gauthier (Rept. No. 141); and

A bill (S. 1829) for the relief of Walter Runke (Rept. No. 142).

Mr. SPENCER. From the Committee on Claims I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 154) to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Arthur E. Rump. I shall present the report when prepared.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. KENDRICK, from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which was referred the bill (S. 1251) providing for investigations for irrigation works in Green River, Wyo., reported it without amendment.

Mr. KING. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the resolution (S. Res. 70) directing the Committee on Naval Affairs to investigate the case of former Capt. Edmund G. Chamberlain, United States Marine Corps, and I submit a report thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

ALLEGHENY RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. 5616) granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Venango County, their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the State of Pennsylvania, and I submit a report (No. 135) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the commissioners of Venango County, Pa., and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Allegheny River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at Oil City, Pa., connecting Petroleum Street, on the south side of the river, with North Petroleum Street, on the north side of the river, in the county of Venango, in the State of Pennsylvania, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2117) for the relief of R. W. Branson (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2118) granting a pension to Hester A. Record, or Ricketts (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2119) granting a pension to Anna D. Blackford (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2120) granting a pension to Sarah Burford (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 2121) granting a pension to George Coghill; and

A bill (S. 2122) granting a pension to Vina Cochran (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HARRIS:

A bill (S. 2123) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to loan to the Federal Farm Loan Board the sum of $200,000,000, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 2124) to relinquish, release, remise, and quitclaim all right, title, and interest of the United States of America in and to all the lands contained within sections 17 and 20, township 3 south, range 1 west, St. Stephens meridian, Alabama; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. BURSUM:

A bill (S. 2125) to amend an act approved June 22, 1910, entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands"; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. ODDIE:

A bill (S. 2126) granting a pension to Richard H. Thomas; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GLASS:

A bill (S. 2127) for the relief of the widow of W. J. S. Stewart; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2128) to establish a bureau of submarines in the Department of the Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) authorizing the Postmaster General to appoint delegates to the Pan American Postal Congress; to the Committee on Appropriations.

PROPOSED VETERANS' BUREAU.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6611) to establish in the Treasury Department a veterans' bureau and to improve the facilities and service of such bureau, and further to amend and modify the war risk insurance act, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR VETERANS OF WORLD WAR.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for an order for the printing of 24,000 copies of Report No. 133, on the veterans' adjusted compensation bill. I am informed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], after looking over the report, that this number can be printed for the use of the Senate without a concurrent resolution. I ask that the order be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That 24,000 additional copies of Senate Report 133 be printed for use of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2089) authorizing the appointment of an additional judge for the district of Minnesota.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing that that should be accorded if there is to be no debate upon the subject.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think there will be any debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the judicial district of the State of Minnesota, who shall possess the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same compensation and allowance as the present judges of said district.

SEC. 2. That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the district of Minnesota by the retirement, disqualification, or death of a judge in said district, such vacancy shall not be filled, and thereafter there shall be but two district judges in said district.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

CONDITIONS IN THE COAL FIELDS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 80.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 80, which, for information, the Secretary will state.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution by title, as follows:

A resolution directing the Committee on Education and Labor to investigate the recent acts of violence in the coal fields of West Virginia and adjacent territory and the causes which led to the conditions which now exist in said territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution, which, as amended June 13, 1921, was read as follows:

Whereas conditions of violence at present exist along the border between West Virginia and Kentucky; and

Whereas for a long period in the past in the coal fields of West Virginia there have been disturbed conditions which have led to turbulence and violence and bloodshed; and

Whereas the conditions referred to are a menace to orderly democratic government and to the general safety and welfare of the people living in the territory affected: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, or any subcommittee thereof, to be appointed by it, is hereby authorized and directed to make a thorough and complete investigation of the conditions existing in the coal fields of West Virginia, in the territory adjacent to the border of West Virginia and Kentucky; that said committee ascertain the causes of the recent acts of violence upon said border and of the conditions which have existed and do now exist in the said coal fields, and generally investigate thoroughly the causes which have led to conditions which have obtained in the past and which now exist in said territory and report its findings and conclusions thereon to the Senate. The committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit at such time and place as it may deem necessary; the expenses of said investigation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I will delay the Senate but a moment or two in reference to this resolution. Some debate ensued upon it when last it was before the Senate. It has been reported favorably, first by the Committee on Education and Labor, secondly by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The design of this resolution is to prevent, so far as it may, and those who favor it believe that it will go a very great way in that direction, the civil war which is now proceeding in certain parts of West Virginia. If the resolution had been passed when it was before the Senate the other day, I do not think I speak extravagantly in saying that it would have saved one life, possibly more, because on the day following the debate here, when it was obvious that there was opposition to the passage of the resolution, and when it was assumed in West Virginia that the Senate would not take cognizance of conditions there, again occurred a shooting, which is described as a most brutal murder by some of the interested parties in this specific controversy.

There exists in West Virginia to-day an unthinkable and an intolerable condition. I am not disposed, because I am asking that a committee be appointed for that purpose, to lay the blame in any particular direction, but wherever the blame may rest, whether it be with one party to the controversy or another, what exists there is something that can not be tolerated in a democracy, and no body such as ours should for an instant permit it to continue if in any degree it can be arrested.

In this territory in West Virginia the only law which has in the past existed is that law which is enforced by the dominant power there. It is claimed to me that in certain places there when one got off a railroad train he was inspected by a detective in the employment of mine owners and only permitted to get off if he could pass that inspection. It is a matter which can not be controverted that the deputy sheriffs of certain counties are paid by the mine owners and those deputy sheriffs therefore yield their allegiance to the people who thus pay them. The result of course is obvious. Under such circumstances, there is no such thing as a Constitution. There is no such thing as protection of the law. There is no such thing as the pursuit of happiness. There is no such thing as that which is guaranteed by the laws and the Constitution of this land.

Not only that, sir, but some of those deputy sheriffs who are thus in the pay of the mine owners, some of those men who are thus sworn as deputy sheriffs to uphold the law, are private detectives employed by the mine owners' association. These facts have been proven and therefore I dare speak of them. I do not speak of the outrages said to have occurred in that district because it may be asserted there is a controversy respecting them, but when I say that the law has been enforced by the paid detectives of privately owned mines I speak by the record, the record of the investigation made by the governor of West Virginia himself.

I mention not only that, but I mention as an uncontroverted fact the existence of a state of civil war now in that territory. The day after our debate, when the resolution was previously before the Senate, a man was killed. Here is the story of his killing as related by two eyewitnesses. A guard held him up. He was told to raise his hands. He raised them. The guard told him to advance. He advanced and got within 6 feet of the guard with his arms uplifted. He was told to raise them higher. He did so, and then the guard said, "You have got a minute to live. What have you got to say?" The man with his hands in the air said, "God have mercy on my soul," and a soft-nosed bullet penetrated his body and killed him at once. Not alone that, but these witnesses assert—I am not vouching for all that they say, but the witnesses at least assert the fact—they took this man by the heels and dragged him down into the village as an object lesson to others, and would not even permit his wife to go near his remains after thus they had brutally shot him.

This occurred the day after the resolution was before the Senate last week. It never would have occurred if we had passed the resolution and had a senatorial investigating committee appointed. Do Senators wish to see some of the scenes from the places where this civil war exists? I have before me photographs taken within the past week of the tent colony there, showing men and women living simply under God's canopy in tents, and in many cases guards have wantonly slashed them so as to destroy the only abode that these poor people have; their scanty furniture has been smashed and their little household goods have been wantonly destroyed.

You cry about the atrocities beyond the sea and the cruelty over there. Do you know that what these men say they can prove? They claim that the women and the children of that tent colony were marched in front of the tents and the men who are there fighting one side of this civil war scattered themselves among those women and children, firing their guns into the hills where they supposed might be the husbands, the fathers, or the relatives of the women and children, and stood there firing from the very ranks of the women and children so there could be no return fire, or if a return fire, that the women and children would be killed.

I listened to the thrilling and eloquent words yesterday of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] concerning Ireland. I heard him tell of the cruelties there. I have read in the past of that which transpired in the war where women sometimes were taken as hostages by one of the combatants, but there never has been in our history, if these stories be accurate, anything like the conditions that obtain to-day in this territory at our very doors. It is because thus they obtain that I am speaking to get a senatorial investigation.

Senators on the other side of the aisle ask what good can we do? Another Senator said, "Oh, the cost of this." Ten or fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, as the case may be, it may cost, but lay this against conditions which strike at the very fundamentals of democracy. What good can we do? The instant that a senatorial investigating committee is appointed that very instant this civil war will cease, and that very moment the good will be accomplished. I do hope that the resolution will pass, and that there will be a committee sent without delay into that territory to develop what is transpiring there.

I should like some of the Senators on the other side who do not believe in the investigation and who wonder what we could do, to look at the photographs which I have here of the humble tents in that territory, to look at the people who are down there, and then to say that they will not render the modicum of aid that we are able to render in this instance. I trust the Senate will no longer delay in the passage of the resolution.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, when this resolution was before the Senate last week I expressed my opposition to it and said at that time about all I cared to say on the subject. I do not care to say much more and do not know that there is need to say much more to show that the resolution should not be adopted.

There is a complete answer to what the Senator from California has so eloquently said, and there is a perfectly constitutional way of proceeding in the matter under discussion. If the conditions which the Senator from California has described exist in the territory involved in the pending resolution, it is the duty of the State government of West Virginia to remedy them and to suppress the lawlessness and insurrection, if able to do so. If the State government of West Virginia is unable to do so, the governor of that State should call upon the President of the United States to declare martial law in the territory involved and send United States troops upon the scene. The governor of West Virginia should lay before the President of the United States the conditions which the Senator from California has so eloquently described, if they exist as portrayed to us. If those conditions exist and if they should be laid before the President of the United States by the governor of the State of West Virginia, and if the governor in that connection should assert that the government of West Virginia is unable to overcome those conditions, and upon that state of facts should appeal to the President of the United States to take action and to send troops there to uphold law and order and constitutional government, I have no doubt the President of the United States, if convinced of the correctness of the statement, would do so, and would furnish all power necessary to restore peace and uphold order.

That, in my opinion, would be the constitutional, the legal, the regular, and the proper method of procedure. If it be true that the State of West Virginia does not have a republican form of government and can not uphold one, it is the duty of the President of the United States, upon being informed and convinced thereof, to see that it has a republican form of government.

There is a constitutional way to do this and it should be done in that way and that way only, if attempted at all. The Constitution of the United States guarantees to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and if West Virginia does not at this time have a republican form of government and is unable to provide one, it should call upon the President of the United States, the Chief Executive, to supply one, and I have no doubt in that event the President would do so. I fully trust the President in this matter. I believe he will do his duty.

As I said, the Constitution of the United States guarantees to each State in the Union a republican form of government. The President of the United States is sworn to uphold the Constitution of the United States. He has taken an oath to do so, and I have no doubt he is ready and willing to do so, and will do so whenever circumstances may require him to take action.

In regard to the question of what good can come of an investigation by the Senate, last week, when the subject was under discussion before the Senate, it was admitted by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] that no good can come of a congressional investigation of the subject, except publicity, to give publicity to the facts.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator will permit me, he either misunderstood what I said or I did not correctly state the view that was mine. Of course, publicity would come; but the very fact, as I stated last week, that there should be a committee appointed would stop this civil war, and if we saved only one life it would be worth the $10,000 that it would cost.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from California contends now and no doubt did contend last week, as he says, that publicity would stop lawlessness. I know the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] was questioned quite closely by one of the Senators on this side of the Chamber as to what could be expected from a senatorial investigation of this condition, and he stated very frankly, nothing but publicity. I think the Senator from California virtually admitted the same thing by being unable to point out what Congress could do except to investigate, what Congress could do beyond an investigation, or what Congress could do as a result of an investigation.

It was admitted by both Senators, I believe, who advocated the passage of the resolution, that Congress could not enact any law to control the situation and that it could not send any armed forces into the field to remedy the condition complained of, and that so far as constitutional action is concerned the Congress could do nothing but investigate and give publicity. That was brought out, and it has to-day again been acknowledged that all Congress can do is to bring about publicity.

I am glad that fact has been made plain to the Senate. If the Senate wishes to expend quite a sum of money, quite a few thousand dollars, at the expense of the people, for the purpose of giving publicity to an industrial disturbance in the State of West Virginia, I suppose it has the power to do so, and there is no way to prevent it, if the Senate wishes to go into the publicity business; but I am glad that issue is before the Senate and that it is admittedly only a question of publicity, and whatever publicity could bring about, that may result from the proposed investigation.

I am opposed to investigations of this kind, as a rule, unless there be some strong and exceptional circumstances which make them necessary and particularly urgent. I am opposed to such investigations because I do not believe that they result in the accomplishment of any good. I think they simply consume time and money for no good purpose.

I would have opposed the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] a year or so ago to authorize a committee of the Senate to investigate the steel strike which was in existence at that time had I been on the floor of the Senate when the matter was brought before the Senate. I was not then here, and therefore could not oppose the motion, but I did happen to be here when the Senator from California brought up the pending resolution. Being opposed to it and being opposed to such investigations in general, I deemed it my duty to oppose his resolution. I personally regret to launch my objection to these indiscriminate resolutions for investigations on the particular resolution offered by the Senator from California, for whom I have very high personal regard, but if we are going to take a stand against useless investigations we have to begin somewhere; and I think the resolution offered by the Senator from California affords an excellent and most appropriate opportunity to voice disapproval of useless investigations.

It is admitted that the passage of this resolution is urged by both sides to the controversy, by the mine operators as well as by the striking miners; so in opposing the adoption of the resolution no discrimination can be charged in those who oppose against either the mine operators or the striking miners; no prejudice can be exhibited against either side, for both say they want the investigation.

So I think this an excellent opportunity to oppose investigations of this kind, of which there are entirely too many. I do not think either side is entitled to an investigation by the Senate. I think the public and the rights of constitutional government are entitled to more consideration than is either side of this controversy. I do not believe that the situation in West Virginia offers one exceptional or extraordinary circumstance which would make it an unusual case, requiring investigation by a senatorial committee. There are too many useless and expensive investigations by Congress.

It has become the custom of late years every time there is a strike or an industrial disturbance in the country for one side or both sides to fly to the United States Government and to ask for relief; it is the first move of one or both sides to fly to the Federal Government and ask for interference or support of some kind; if nothing more, for an investigation. I think the sooner employers and employees learn that neither side can expect support in controversies of this kind from the United States Government or from any branch of that Government, and the sooner they learn that they can not expect any interference from the United States Government the sooner they will learn to settle and adjust their differences amongst themselves, according to natural economic laws and in a constitutional manner. If the United States Government would quit interfering in differences between employers and striking employees, in my opinion there would not be nearly so many or frequent strikes.

Of late years it has become a practice every time a strike of any consequence occurs in the United States for the strikers, particularly, to fly to the United States Government or to some branch of it and ask the United States Government to take their side, and for quite a number of years past they have been getting considerable support, from one branch or another of the United States Government until workmen have been encouraged to believe that every time they go on a strike the strikers will get the sympathy or the support of some branch of the United States Government, and enable them thereby to win their point, or to win at least a considerable part of what they are demanding.

I think the sooner the strikers learn that they are not going to get the United States Government to fly to their rescue every time they precipitate a strike the sooner strikes will wane, and the sooner there will be industrial peace and prosperity in the country. When they learn that they are not going to get active support and sympathy and interference from some branch of the Federal Government, they will be a little slower about striking and precipitating industrial disturbances. I think the time has come when they should learn that lesson.

The section of the country which is covered by this controversy is under martial law, I understand, at the present time, by proclamation of the governor of West Virginia.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure. If I am not correct, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator from Montana that there was a proclamation of martial law, but the Supreme Court of West Virginia within the past week has declared that martial law in that district or any district was an incident to military occupation, and it therefore declared the proclamation null and void. So there does not now exist martial law in that district.

Mr. MYERS. That decision was rendered by the supreme court of the State, the Senator says?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. By the Supreme Court of West Virginia.

Mr. MYERS. And it declared the proclamation of the governor null and void?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Supreme Court of West Virginia so decided.

Mr. MYERS. I am glad to have that information. However, the affair is still in the hands of the State authorities.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana allow me to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question in relation to this matter?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. SHIELDS. About six years ago there was, on Paint Creek and Cabin Creek, trouble similar to that now existing, and the Senate passed a resolution along the lines of that now pending. As I recall, in that case the resolution was passed practically after the strike troubles were over. I was a member of the committee appointed under the resolution, which went up to that district and spent several days and heard a great deal of testimony. I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia, because he fully understands the situation, whether that investigation did any good in West Virginia?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is very difficult to say, Mr. President, whether or not that investigation produced the condition of quiet which followed or which, perhaps, existed at the time the investigation took place. There has not been since that time, however, a serious disturbance on Cabin Creek or Paint Creek where the strike took place which was investigated by the committee of which the Senator from Tennessee was a member.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure to the Senator from Idaho, to make an inquiry, with the consent of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly; the Senator from Idaho was a member of the committee to which I have referred.

Mr. BORAH. I was a member of the committee and introduced the original resolution providing for an investigation. A similar resolution was afterwards introduced by the then Senator from Indiana, Mr. Kern.

Mr. SHIELDS. I had forgotten about the Senator from Idaho introducing the original resolution, but I know that Senator Kern pressed the resolution, although he never stated any very good reason why it should be passed by the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. He succeeded in having it passed, at any rate; and I have no doubt at all that the investigation accomplished an immense amount of good. The fact that no law was passed is beside the question; the investigation was the controlling factor in adjusting a very serious situation.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is where the Senator and I differ. I took a great deal of interest in it at the time; but, as I remember, the strike was practically over when the committee went to West Virginia, as was conceded by everyone; and the only result of the action of the committee was that we disturbed the peace of the community and revived a good deal of bad feeling. The committee came home and did not file any report for a long time. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] was chairman of the committee and divided up the work and had different members of the committee prepare reports on the various aspects of the situation, and then he compiled the individual reports and presented them all as one report to the Senate. It was published at a cost to the Government of considerable money.

Mr. MYERS. And that was the end of it, I take it?

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, no; that was not the end of it. It cost the Government considerable money to print the report, and then the report lay in the document room for a good while until it was taken out and burned or sold as junk, or something of that kind. That was the end of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did anybody ever read it?

Mr. SHIELDS. I never heard of a man who ever read it. I know I spent a week in preparing my part of it, but if anybody ever read it he never said anything to me about it. I thought I had done something, but it amounted to practically nothing, and I always thought that there were about three weeks of my time thrown away.

My observation then was that West Virginia was able to take care of herself. As a member of the committee, I met the governor of the State, and I remember very well he did not give us a very warm reception. I thought he was pretty icy when we called at his office. He thought he was able to take care of West Virginia himself, and my observation was that he was able to do so, and that we were there invading West Virginia and interfering with the police power of West Virginia in a very offensive and improper way. That is the conclusion that I came to when I left there, and I was sorry I went there.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was glad the Senator went. I enjoyed his company. However, it was the expression upon all sides there, both of the laboring men and of the mine owners and of the police, that the investigation did assist in settling the situation; that it did stop the disturbance; that it led to an agreement and understanding which, I believe, is still in existence, for there has never been any disturbance to amount to anything at Paint Creek since then. I must say—and for the Senator from Tennessee I have the most profound respect—that this is the first time I have ever heard it contended that that investigation did not result in great good in settling the situation.

Mr. President, the Senator stated that the State of West Virginia was able to settle the matter itself. The State of West Virginia was not able to settle it. What was the State of West Virginia compelled to do in order to deal with the situation?

The governor of West Virginia declared a state of martial law to exist; he undertook to suspend the laws of the State, and undertook to suspend the laws of the United States. Men were gathered in groups of 25, 50, or 100, tried in herds, and sentenced to the penitentiary for crimes and offenses undefined by and unknown to the laws of West Virginia.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question there.

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. If the State government of West Virginia is unable to uphold law and order, is it not the duty of the governor of West Virginia, by proper constitutional methods, to lay the facts before the President of the United States and ask the President for aid to enforce the laws and to keep the peace?

Mr. BORAH. That is one way to settle it.

Mr. MYERS. Is there any other constitutional way?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; there is another constitutional way.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to know what it is.

Mr. BORAH. A man is not only a citizen of West Virginia, but he is a citizen at the same time of the United States, and we have just as much right to investigate concerning his condition and to protect his citizenship as has the State of West Virginia.

Mr. MYERS. What can Congress do to protect it after the investigation is over?

Mr. BORAH. If it is necessary, it can do a great deal, as it did in this instance.

Let me go a little further. As I have said, men had been sent to the penitentiary not according to any defined crime known to the statutes of West Virginia and not in accordance with any punishment provided by the laws of West Virginia, but they had been sent according to the will and discretion of the drumhead court-martial which was sitting to try men never indicted and charged with no offense defined by statutes.

Mr. MYERS. Did the supreme court of the State ever pass upon that action?

Mr. BORAH. They did.

Mr. MYERS. What was the result?

Mr. BORAH. I regret to say it upheld it.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator may, of course, disagree with the conclusions of the court, but a court of last resort has the last word on the rights of citizens.

Mr. BORAH. For the first time in 300 years under Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence a court in the United States held that a drumhead court-martial trial of a civilian in time of peace was a legal proceeding. I challenge the Senator to point to a precedent for such a decision during the last 300 years of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence.

Mr. MYERS. If it involved the Federal rights of citizens, could there not have been an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. BORAH. There could have been an appeal if the men had been in a position to take an appeal, but the Senator can understand that here were 25, 50, or 100 men congregated as so many cattle in a corral, brought in and tried by men who had been fighting them with guns a few days before. What opportunity did these men have? Is it the business of the United States Government to remain silent and inactive when the constitutional rights of its citizens are being taken from them in that way?

Mr. MYERS. I think the Senator from Idaho knows fully as well as anybody that, as a rule, labor unions have plenty of funds with which to defend their members who are accused of crime and to take appeals if necessary. I have no reason to believe that there was an exception in this case. Defendants such as those were do not, as a rule, lack funds.

Mr. BORAH. I will tell the Senator one thing that happened. They took these men, tried them by court-martial, and shaved their heads and sent them to the penitentiary like criminals.

Mr. MYERS. Every man who goes to the penitentiary is treated as a criminal.

Mr. BORAH. But they were not criminals under any procedure known to the laws of the United States. They were not criminals under any procedure known to the laws of West Virginia. They were only criminals because a drumhead court-martial said they were.

Mr. MYERS. They were only criminals according to the last word of the Supreme Court of West Virginia, then.

Mr. BORAH. But I was going to say that the moment we arrived there, as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] knows, they began to turn these men out of the penitentiary. They knew that they had no means of holding them there except by force, and the moment publicity was turned upon the transaction they turned the men loose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am very glad to attest the fact that in a similar case coming before the supreme court of my State it was adjudged that the decrees of a court-martial consigning men in similar conditions to the penitentiary were wholly without jurisdiction and were annulled by the supreme court of the State.

Mr. BORAH. The State of Idaho has had some trouble about these situations. It is perfectly useless to say to those of us who have passed through these scenes, and who have seen the bloodshed and the riot and the crime upon both sides, that the presence of the Federal Government is not a steadying and a desirable presence, and one that has a good effect upon the situation. There is no reason in the world why the Federal Government, when its citizenship is thus being treated, should not inquire into the situation. What it can do in the way of legislation depends upon what it finds; but it had the effect in West Virginia, I venture to say, of turning out of prison hundreds of men who were there in violation of every law known to the State of West Virginia and the United States.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. MYERS. If these lamentable conditions exist there again, as the Senator says they existed there once before, is not the President of the United States the proper party to apply Federal power, and is it not the duty of the governor of West Virginia to apply to the President of the United States for assistance; and if he is applied to upon a proper showing, does not the Senator from Idaho believe that the President of the United States will grant it?

UMI

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the President of the United States has a right to look after the citizenship of the United States in West Virginia, the Congress of the United States has the same right.

Mr. MYERS. But the Constitution of the United States vests the President of the United States with the sole power to declare martial law and send Federal troops into a State.

Mr. BORAH. That is true enough; but why does the Senator want to resort to martial law? If we can go there, have an investigation, uncover the situation, let in the daylight, turn on the publicity, and it has its effect, why does the Senator want a declaration of martial law?

Mr. MYERS. The Senator proposes that we shall administer some soothing sirup in a way not recognized by the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is recognized by the Constitution.

Mr. MYERS. I do not know of any section of the Constitution which gives the Congress that power.

Mr. BORAH. I know that the Constitution of the United States recognizes a citizenship both Federal and State, and it is just as much our duty to look after it as it is the duty of the State of West Virginia.

Mr. MYERS. And the Federal Constitution names the way in which those rights shall be protected by the Federal Government; the only way and the exclusive way. Let us proceed in that way.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not intend to take any particular part in this discussion. I simply wanted to say that I have never had any doubt as to the beneficial effect of the investigation which we had. I have never talked with a mine owner or a labor leader or a laboring man in regard to it who did not believe that it had a beneficial effect. Before we had proceeded to the conclusion of it the entire matter was settled, a contract was entered into which was satisfactory to the different parties, and the entire matter was adjusted. Bloodshed ceased, riots ceased, and the disturbance ceased. What else would you want to accomplish?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure again to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, of course no man's memory is infallible, but the Senator from Idaho and I remember the facts of this Cabin Creek and Paint Creek investigation entirely differently. As I remember it, when the investigation was begun the whole disturbance was practically over, as I understand it is in this matter. These parties came down here and wanted an investigation. I had forgotten the resolution of the Senator from Idaho, but I do remember Senator Kern agitating it here in a manner that did not appeal to me at the time, because it looked to me as if there was too much demagoguery in it; but I was then on the Committee on Education and Labor and was appointed a member of the committee. I have always been very much interested in the denial of the constitutional rights of any man. I went out there very much interested; but, according to my recollection, I found out that the whole matter had been practically settled between these parties and peace restored. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the chairman of the committee, distributed the work among the several members of the committee to report upon the different subjects of the resolution.

I believe the matter of martial law was what the Senator from Idaho was to write about. I have forgotten what he wrote. I was so disgusted with the uselessness of the whole thing that, while I always like to hear everything he says and read everything he writes, I have no recollection of what he wrote on the subject. My assignment was the alleged violation of the Sherman antitrust law by both parties in the matter. I wrote what I thought was a very learned report about it, but I do not think anybody ever read it.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I read the Senator's report. I read all the reports before they went in, because that was a part of the duty which was assigned to each of us. While we were supposed to write them separately, we were supposed to go over them collectively. I have no doubt that the Senator went through mine, although it did not impress him sufficiently for him to remember it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I never heard any more of it afterwards. It occurred to me that it was about the most useless expenditure of public money that I ever knew. Of course, I was rather new in the Senate at that time. I have seen a good many things since.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly.

Mr. DIAL. Was this a joint commission of the House and Senate?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; this was a committee of the Senate. I took a good deal of interest in it at that time. As I say, there had been reports here that men had been deprived of their constitutional rights, and I looked into that phase of the matter, and I agree with the Senator from Idaho that there were some things done there that I did not approve—that I thought were wrong and unjust—some very arbitrary proceedings, and I found that there was most violent conduct upon both sides of the affair.

I found first from the evidence that there were some four or five hundred men imported there in order to organize a country that had not been unionized, and that they incited and committed all sorts of crimes, and that the operators imported a lot of men—I have forgotten what they called them; mine guards, I believe—from other States, that retaliated, and it was a bad state of affairs. They had fought it out before we got there. We excited a good deal of feeling there, and I really thought the Senator from Idaho was disgusted with the matter before I was, because he left and came home a day before I did. I stayed one day longer; but there were three others of the committee—there were five of us altogether—that visited the mines and had their photographs taken up there at the mines.

Mr. BORAH. I left when the business was over and came home.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not think the Senator from Idaho was in that picture, and I want to say right now that I was not. I did not go up to the mines. I thought that the business of the committee was down there at Charleston, where we had our headquarters. I realized the uselessness of the whole thing, and thought that we ought to have stayed away. I have never heard that the investigation did any good, because the good was already done and the settlement made before we got there, as I remember. I may be mistaken, and the Senator from Idaho may be right, but I should have to look up the record before I agreed with him that he was right.

I understand that that is practically the situation here. I understand that the Senator from West Virginia has stated that this trouble is all over. Am I correct about that?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know as to that, but I understood the Senator from West Virginia so to say.

Mr. SHIELDS. That was my understanding from reading the RECORD. I was not present at the discussion the other day. I understand in this case that both the operators and the miners want a committee to go up there and hear the evidence and give publicity to the matter. Now, that might be very beneficial both to the operators and to the miners. It has been argued here, as I understand, that because both consent to it it ought to be done. It takes more than the consent of both the parties to a controversy to loot the United States Treasury in investigations of this kind. I do not know of anything that Congress can do. It did not do anything in the former investigation. This is a similar one. It is almost a case in point, and I do not understand that they can do anything now. I have not heard that it is proposed to do anything.

I do not remember that there were hundreds of men sent to the penitentiary from West Virginia before, as the Senator from Idaho does, but that is a matter of record. It can be easily ascertained. There were some, and some I thought wrongfully, upon the investigation and the record that I read.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator will refer to the testimony, he will see that they were brought in by twenty-fives and fifties and a hundred and tried in groups. The drumhead court-martial sat, and finally it rendered its judgment, and it sent them in droves to the penitentiary at a time. It was a most intolerable procedure. It had no sanction in law and should never have been thought of in a government of law. It was rank militarism, it was government by a military despot. That is the plain truth about it.

Mr. SHIELDS. When the Senator made his part of that report did he specify any such facts as those?

Mr. BORAH. They are testified to in the report. It is all there.

Mr. SHIELDS. In the evidence, the Senator means; not in the report.

Mr. BORAH. Well, in the evidence. It is all bound now as a two or three volume report.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator's recollection and mine are entirely different about that. There were some such cases, and there were too many. I believed those officers were arbitrary, and while they were under great provocation they were not justified in violating the law or the Constitution; but the Senator's idea that those men were without any remedy is entirely at fault. Every one of them had a right to sue out a writ of habeas corpus and be relieved from an unconstitutional judgment—one not authorized by law. They had a clear, unembarrassed remedy. There is no doubt about that. The Senator will agree with me that from the evidence a great many of those men ought to have been in the penitentiary, and some on both sides ought to have been in the penitentiary.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think there were some on both sides that ought to have been in the penitentiary, but they ought to have been sent there according to legal methods.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Tennessee, both, to exchange remarks; each in turn, as they may desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; I yield for an inquiry of any length by either.

Mr. SHIELDS. I just want to say further in regard to this matter that I do not believe in expending money for this investigation merely to accommodate the parties, although both of them want it and agree on it. It takes something more than the consent of two opposing parties to justify all this expense and all this trouble. I do not believe in these investigations unless Congress can see how it can pass some legislation based upon the result of the investigations to remedy the evil.

There is no one here, so far as I have heard, who has asserted that there is any possibility—that there is any warrant under the Constitution for interfering with the police power of West Virginia by such a proceeding. It is holding out a false hope and deluding those interested. It is not calculated to shake the confidence of the people in the authority of the State government and cause censorship.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, it seems that they must have a good many investigations down in West Virginia. I asked the Senator from Tennessee if the investigation he referred to was a joint one, and he said not. I was talking with a Congressman just a few minutes ago, and he said that he was a member of an investigating committee several years ago which investigated conditions in that State, and that he was satisfied it was a useless expenditure of money; and he said that hereafter he would oppose any such investigation; that it was entirely out of place and unnecessary.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will allow me, I desire to inquire of the Senator from West Virginia whether this trouble is all over and quiet reigns there now? That was suggested, and I would like to have the Senator inform us whether the trouble is over.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, replying to the Senator from North Carolina, the trouble is not over; that is, I can not say there is no violence nor threats of violence in that territory. So far as the strike itself and the working of the mines is concerned, it is true, I am told by those who are in that territory, that they have all the men in the mines they need; that the mines there are producing all the coal for which they have orders, and are getting out more nearly a normal percentage of coal than is being produced in any other region in that State. The men who went on strike are, however, living in tent colonies near by. They are being supported by the national mine organization, and, of course, they have nothing much to do except to sit by and watch the proceedings.

Mr. OVERMAN. What I want to know is whether there is quiet there, or whether disorder and mob rule prevail at this time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator that the trouble extends over only a comparatively small portion of one county, and there is no great outbreak of violence. Occasionally some hot-headed person does an act that is not at all creditable, and the one described by the Senator from California a while ago, of course, is indefensible if the facts are as stated. But there are events that lead up to those outrages on both sides.

The Senator has described the condition of these tent colonies. I do not defend the cutting of those tents or the firing upon the men or women who are in the tent colonies; yet, on the other hand, there has been firing upon the houses of the miners who are attempting now to work the mines. There has been firing upon the miners who are working to get out coal, and, of course, that creates a bitter feeling of hostility between the contending factions, as is always the case in such disturbances, no matter in what State they occur. Such incidents occur in Philadelphia, and in New York, and in the country generally. The Senator from Idaho has stated that they occur out in Idaho. No State is immune from them when clashes take place between employers and employees.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is true, but I wanted to know particularly whether the governor of the State and the authorities there have not handled the matter in such a way that now quiet reigns in that part of the county.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I believe that quiet generally reigns throughout that territory. I want to correct, in this connection, a statement made by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. He stated that there was no force there endeavoring to uphold the laws of the State except mine guards, privately paid. That is not the case. I know the Senator made that statement inadvertently and without proper information.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; Mr. President, permit me to correct the Senator. What I was endeavoring to assert was that the conditions down there had been due to the fact that the law was administered by those who were in the pay of private corporations. There is to-day, of course, another force in the field besides the deputy sheriffs in the pay of the mine owners—I grant that very readily.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I misunderstood the Senator, and I did not want intentionally to misinterpret anything he said. I understood the Senator to state that there is no force down there upholding the laws of the State except these mine guards, privately paid. There is a State force down there, the State constabulary, a very efficient force, and it is due to their presence in that territory now, very probably, that there is a condition of comparative peace and quietude.

The Senator also stated that there was no constitutional law there. He was referring, possibly, to the condition which exists when two men armed get together and fight, for they are not obeying the Constitution. The population of that entire territory is living under constitutional guaranties. Williamson, the county seat of that county, is carrying on its accustomed business. The people of the county generally, while they deplore the situation and are disturbed by it, yet go about their ordinary avocations.

Yet I believe, Mr. President and Senators, that an investigation into this situation would have a quieting effect upon it, and might tend to compose the differences between the belligerent factions. I believe that it so resulted possibly in the case of the Paint Creek and Cabin Creek clash. I believe that the appointment of the committee which investigated the Colorado strike, of which I was a member, had such a quieting effect. I know from personal experience, as a member of that committee, that during the time the committee was in Colorado no violence of any kind occurred. The people on both sides were put upon their good behavior because a body of men representing the legislative authority of the General Government was there on the ground, ready to listen to any grievances which either side might have. It had a decidedly quieting effect, and there was very little if any trouble after that investigating committee concluded its labors and made its report. Whether that followed as cause and effect I can not say, any more than I can say whether the settlement of the strike difficulty in the Cabin Creek and Paint Creek sections was effect following cause. But they were certainly coincident, and there is a fair presumption that both of those investigations did some good.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question. Is West Virginia able to administer its own police laws and preserve the peace of the State?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator, I will say that I believe the State of West Virginia is abundantly able, under ordinary conditions, to maintain law and order. The State is somewhat at a disadvantage just at this time, due to the war. When we entered the war West Virginia had a splendid militia organization, consisting of two regiments of militia. They were taken down to the border. Later they were taken to Europe in the Great World War and afterwards disbanded, as were the militia of almost all the States.

Since the reorganization act was passed last June there has not been an opportunity to reorganize our State militia; and, as a matter of fact, it is stated to me that the boys who were in the service refuse now to enlist in the militia, and those who were not in the service, particularly in view of the fact that a strike trouble is pending down in a section of the State, do not want to go into the militia, and it has been impossible to organize the State militia. Their mothers and fathers, too, do not want their boys to go down into that territory.

Mr. SHIELDS. They are opposed to any more wars?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are opposed to any more wars.

Mr. SHIELDS. Those are the same men who were opposed to the League of Nations—to sending our boys over to maintain order and peace in Europe—are they not?

UMI

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Some of them are. Two years ago the legislature passed a law providing for a State constabulary, not a large force, but quite an expensive one to maintain, which cost a great deal more money than the militia did.

It was thought, following the example of Pennsylvania and some other States, that that was the very best way to preserve peace and quietude, particularly where there was a large area to be covered, and it was the design of that law to prevent the employment of private mine guards, which the Senator has mentioned. I will say, further, that the legislature which has just adjourned extended that law and provided for an additional force, but it has not been possible as yet to organize that force. So the State has at this time only a small force of 75 to 100 men available for this duty.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to intimate that the sheriffs of these several counties have not the right possessed by sheriffs in every other State to summon a posse comitatus to maintain law and order, and could not the sheriffs of the counties in that way bring there 100,000 men, if necessary, to preserve order?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was going to speak of that feature of the case, Mr. President, when the Senator interrupted me.

The sheriff of Mingo County summoned to his aid a large number of citizens, and citizens have, to the number of a hundred or more, come forward and volunteered to become members of the posse of the sheriff of that county in order to maintain order. When the President, in his wisdom, saw fit not to send the Federal troops down there, that is the action which was taken. The governor proclaimed martial law. That act has since been declared by the Supreme Court of West Virginia to be without authority of law; it has been declared null and void.

So we have the State constabulary and a large force of deputy sheriffs, most of whom are citizens of the county where the trouble exists, who are interested in preserving order for the benefit of the general public and who represent the police power of the county.

Mr. SHIELDS. I take it for granted, Mr. President, that at least 90 per cent of the citizens of that county are law-abiding men and believe in law and order. I have that much confidence in the citizenship of West Virginia.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think a very much larger percentage of the citizenship of that county are in favor of maintaining law and order and stand for law and order.

Mr. SHIELDS. Are not 90 per cent of the people able to maintain law and order? Can they not compete with and control the other 10 per cent?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are doing so at this time with a fair degree of success.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then there is no use of a committee of the Senate going there and interfering with the internal and domestic affairs of West Virginia. It is in the governor's power to enforce the police powers of the State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, Mr. President, the main questions at issue there are not settled. These men are being maintained there in idleness in these tent colonies, and of course the men who are working in the mines are under constant threat of violence. There is no doubt that some violence has been done to the men in the tent colonies, and some of those in the tent colonies have been strongly suspected at times of inciting and committing acts of violence. There have been acts of violence on both sides which are absolutely indefensible.

So while there is a condition of comparative quietude there, yet the threat is still there, and if the Senate should in its wisdom order this investigation, I believe it would have a good effect in quieting the general situation, by enabling these people to get together and thrash out their differences face to face, and to reach some amicable basis of settlement.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think the Senator has announced the real purpose of both the parties in this case in asking for this investigation. They want their differences settled at the expense of the United States, instead of settling them themselves in the ordinary way and at their own expense. I do not know of any special privilege that coal operators and coal miners have to have publicity given to their differences and settlements made of them any more than other classes of people in the United States have. Why can they not get together and give publicity to their respective views? Why can they not meet and settle these matters themselves, without calling on the Government to resort to this extraordinary and expensive proceeding? Does the Senator know of any just reason, if both of them are honest and want to come to a fair agreement about this matter, why they can not do it? Can they not give publicity to their differences in other ways? Do they not know the facts, without Senators going up there and swearing them and making them tell them, as we did in the Paint Creek and Cabin Creek matter?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They could do it, but they do not do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives for reference.

MEMORIAL TO DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE EMPLOYEES.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 112) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to employees of the United States Department of Agriculture who died in the War with Germany was read twice by its title.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, on yesterday a Senate joint resolution of similar character passed this body. It has been slightly changed by the House; it is entirely satisfactory to me, and I ask that the measure be placed upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am not going to object, because there is a good deal of routine business to be conducted by the Senate. Yesterday when we adjourned it was understood that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] should have the opportunity to-day to finish his speech on the Irish question. Following him, I wish to speak on the pending coal bill, which is the unfinished business. I desire to obtain consideration of that bill by the Senate as soon as possible, but if the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] wishes temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think I rose before the Senator from California and claimed the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am simply making a statement; I am not going to interfere——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the other side is going to be heard, I wish to be heard, too.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] wishes to speak on this question. Therefore I shall follow the Senator from Nebraska if I have the opportunity to do so to-day—if not to-day, then on to-morrow—and I shall move a recess of the Senate to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I wish to ask unanimous consent that the business now before the Senate, the unfinished business, be laid aside temporarily and that we may proceed further with the resolution we have just been debating.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in accordance with my attitude toward the resolution, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from California has a right to move to proceed to the consideration of the resolution if he sees fit.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to know what is before the Senate at this time. Is it not the House joint resolution just laid before the Senate by the Chair?

Mr. FERNALD. It is a joint resolution passed yesterday by the House and——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah addressed his inquiry to the Chair, and the Chair responds that the business now before the Senate is Senate bill 1806, the unfinished business.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. May I inquire what became of my request?

Mr. KING. I object.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What became of my motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's motion was not in order at the time it was made. The Chair lays before the Senate bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives, and those must be submitted to the Senate before anything else is done. House joint resolution 112 will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 4976. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Trumbull Steel Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Mahoning River in the State of Ohio; to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 5756. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for these islands," approved August 29, 1916; to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

H. R. 6573. An act to further reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

H. R. 6877. An act to permit a compact or agreement between the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming, respecting the disposition and apportionment of the waters of the Colorado River, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

H. J. Res. 153. Joint resolution permitting the admission of certain aliens who sailed from foreign ports on or before June 8, 1921, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will state the inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the Senate bill which the Chair a moment ago said is now before the Senate? He described it by number only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a bill introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, relating to rates on coal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought there was a request to lay it aside temporarily.

Mr. KING. That was objected to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

CONDITIONS IN IRELAND.

Mr. NORRIS resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. His speech entire is as follows:

Monday, June 20, 1921.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on the 16th day of April last I introduced a joint resolution which I now ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 27) protesting against violations of the laws of land warfare committed by the British forces against the Irish people in their struggle for independence.

Whereas there is a state of war existing between the Government of Great Britain and the people of Ireland; and

Whereas the armed forces of Great Britain in Ireland have violated the laws of warfare as set forth in The Hague Convention of 1907, to which the Government of the United States is a signatory power, in the following particulars:

(1) Prisoners of war are not treated as prisoners of the British Government but as prisoners of the individuals or corps that capture them.

(2) Such prisoners are subjected to cruel and inhuman treatment.

(3) Prisoners are assassinated without excuse, or under the pretext that they are attempting to escape.

(4) The property of prisoners is confiscated.

(5) Prisoners, as well as noncombatant civilians, are compelled by military force to perform excessive labor.

(6) Irish nationals are forced to take part in the operations of war against their own people.

(7) Hostages are carried by the British forces when engaged in war operations.

(8) Irish nationals are forced to swear allegiance to the Government of the invading forces.

(9) Irish citizens are forced under extreme torture to give information about their armed forces.

(10) Family rights and honor, the lives of persons, and private property are violated by arson, pillage, and assassination. Husbands and sons are killed in the presence of their wives and mothers. Innocent women and children are shot down in cold blood by soldiers driving through the streets in motor lorries.

(11) Penalties are laid upon towns and villages as the result of the acts of individuals for which they can not be held legally responsible; homes are broken into in the dead of night, the inhabitants terrorized, and the houses looted and burned. During the year 1920 more than 48,000 homes were thus violated.

(12) Factories, creameries, hayricks, and other food of domestic animals, owned by noncombatants, are burned and destroyed, leaving thousands of people without means of gaining a livelihood and thus bringing on much suffering and starvation.

(13) A policy of reprisals has been instituted, by which villages are laid waste and homes are destroyed, contrary to the law of nations and of humanity.

(14) The property of religious, educational, and civic institutions is destroyed.

And

Whereas many thousands of loyal citizens of the United States are related by blood to the victims of these atrocities in Ireland; and

Whereas this situation is making it exceedingly difficult to maintain unimpaired and unembarrassed the long-standing good will and common understanding between the United States and Great Britain, which the Congress is zealously desirous of fostering and perpetuating: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the Irish people are entitled to a government of their own choice; and

That the Congress views with horror and indignation the continued violation of the dictates of humanity and the laws of war by the armed forces of Great Britain in Ireland and most solemnly protests to the world against the continuation of such acts of uncivilized warfare.

SHALL IRELAND BE FREE?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in urging the Senate to pass this joint resolution, I desire at the beginning to say that I have no ill-will against the British people. I have no desire to disrupt the British Empire. I want to live, and I want my country to live in entire peace and harmony with all the peoples of the earth, and I am urging the passage of this joint resolution because I believe its passage will tend to bring about such peace and harmony and continued friendship and good will among the nations of the world. I desire not only that my country should remain at peace with the world but I am particularly anxious that such peace should exist between us and the great English-speaking nation whose territory reaches around the world. I am anxious that no steps should be taken by my country that will in any way interfere with the good understanding and the friendly relations existing between us and Great Britain. I want to avoid, if I can, taking any action that would offend the sensibilities of the English people, and I shall make no criticism of the British Government that I would not make with equal candor against my own country did I believe similar conditions warranting such criticism existed.

While the criticisms I shall offer have as their primary object the alleviation of the sufferings of the Irish race, they are nevertheless made in the hope and in the belief that they will appeal to the fair-mindedness of the British people themselves and to the liberty-loving people of the civilized world. I will not be dissuaded, however, or deviate from the course that I have outlined by any fear of danger or of censure that many honest people entertain that we must not speak the truth for fear of bringing upon us and our country the enmity and the ill-will of any nation or people, however great and powerful. I hope that what I shall say may be accepted in a spirit of kindliness and friendliness, but I will not be dissuaded from saying it even though the unreasonable and the unfair shall cry out that we must not raise our voices in behalf of downtrodden and suffering humanity lest we give offense.

The crime of permanently holding in subjection against their will a people or a nation who are able and competent to govern themselves, is second only to that of human slavery. It is, in effect, slavery upon a large scale. The right of a people to be free is just as sacred as the right of an individual to be free. Human freedom is an impulse of the soul. It is the sacred right of every person and of every nation. It may be mainly a sentiment, but it is a controlling spirit that is fostered and nourished in the breast of every civilized human being. It is more sacred than life itself, and the struggle of any civilized nation for freedom and self-government is one that should appeal, and does appeal, to all honest and intelligent people. Good government is desirable and is the aim of the common people of every civilized nation, but free government is the inalienable right of every civilized nation of the earth. It is just as unjust, just as unholy, and just as reprehensible for one civilized nation to hold another civilized nation in subjection as it is for an individual to own the flesh and blood of his fellow being and to sell and traffic in human slavery.

THE STRUGGLE OF IRELAND FOR FREEDOM.

For more than seven centuries the Irish people have struggled to be free. During all those years the Irish nation, against its will, has been held in national subjection by Great Britain by force and intimidation. No one who has given any study to history and to present conditions has any doubt but what the Irish people possess all the qualifications necessary for self-government. They have never yet willingly submitted to British rule. During the centuries that have passed they have been crying out to a sympathizing world for self-determination, for their liberty and their freedom. They have suffered during these years the unjust and the humiliating rule of military power. Under the control of a foreign Government, they have not been able to develop their industries or enact the laws for their own government, but, on the other hand, have been compelled, to a very great extent, to see the results of their labors and their energy devoted to the upbuilding of the powerful nation that holds them in subjection against their will. Their natural resources remain dormant; their trade and their commerce exist mainly for the purpose of helping and assisting their conquerors and their masters. During the years of toil and strife they have seen their population dwindle and disappear until one-half of the people of their fertile island have vanished.

The appeal of Ireland ought to come with particular force to the people of America, the people whose forefathers rebelled from the same mother country and who obtained their freedom upon the battle field on account of persecutions that in their severity can not begin to compare with the afflictions that have been suffered and are being suffered by the people of Ireland. We hold in sacred remembrance and the entire civilized world looks with admiration upon our forefathers who became traitors to the mother country in order to be free. Those who believe in the sacred principles enunciated by our forefathers in the Declaration of Independence can not close their ears to Ireland's cry. Mindful of our own freedom and our own history, and jealously believing in the righteousness of our forefathers' cause, we can not do less than in the words of the pending resolution protest to the civilized world against the holding in national bondage, without their consent, one of the civilized races of the world.

We have recently emerged from a great war in which we were one of the Allies of Great Britain. We announced to the world and Great Britain announced to the world that the war was being fought for the protection of the rights of weak nations; for the self-determination of peoples. The American soldier and the British soldier who fought side by side upon the battle fields of Europe believed that they were fighting, yes, that they were dying, for the principle of freedom and the right of every people to govern themselves. Not only the soldiers but the men, women, and children who sacrificed in every way at home to keep the Army at the front, all believed that their sacrifices were being made for humanity, justice, and civilization. We were all justified in this belief. Whatever disagreement might have existed at the beginning it was soon abated by the slogans of the leaders of our country and of Great Britain, who continually proclaimed in the face of the world that such were the objects to be attained by the war, and that human freedom would be secured and cared for when the belligerent nations met around the peace table.

It is unnecessary for me to review the official messages and the promises to humanity made by our own President. They are familiar to all of us, but the promises of righteousness made to us were only a duplication of the promises that were made by British statesmen to their people, to the people of Ireland, and to the world.

PROMISES BY THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT AND BRITISH STATESMEN AS TO THE OBJECTS AND AIMS OF THE WAR.

I want to read, Mr. President, a few extracts from some of the leading statesmen of Great Britain.

On April 17, 1917, the British cabinet sent a message to America, from which I take the following quotation:

The glowing phrases of the President's noble deliverance illumine the horizon and make clearer than ever the goal we are striving to reach. * * * These words represent the faith which inspires and sustains our people in the tremendous sacrifices they have made and are still making. They also believe that the unity and peace of mankind can only rest upon democracy; upon the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government; upon the rights and liberties of nations, both great and small, and upon the universal dominion of public right.

This message, sent by the British cabinet, was in response to the famous message of President Wilson in which the noted "14 points" were included and is an official expression not only of the sentiments of Great Britain, as expressed through her official cabinet, but an official approval of everything that President Wilson said.

On September 19, 1914, Lloyd-George made a speech, from which I take the following:

The heroic deeds that thrill humanity through generations were the deeds of little nations fighting for their freedom. Yes; and the salvation of mankind came through a little nation.

And again Lloyd-George, in the House of Commons, on April 16, 1919, used the following language:

Supposing you * * * reorganize Russia, what manner of government would you set up there?

You must set up a government which the people want; otherwise it would be an outrage on all the principles for which we fought in the war.

How true, Mr. President, as applied to Ireland! Let me read it again, and instead of saying "Russia" let me say "Ireland." With that one change, it will read as follows:

Supposing you * * * reorganize Ireland, what manner of government would you set up there?

You must set up a government which the people want; otherwise it would be an outrage on all the principles for which we fought in the war.

On November 9, 1914, the great Englishman, Arthur Balfour, speaking in behalf of his country, used the following language:

* * * We fight, not for ourselves alone, but for civilization, drawn to the cause of small States, the cause of all those countries which desire to develop their own civilization in their own way, following their own ideals without interference from any insolent and unauthorized aggressor. That is the cause for which we fight.

On September 6, 1917, Lloyd-George said:

* * * But if this is the day of great empires it is also preeminently the day of little nations. It is around them that the greatest struggle for liberty centers.

And on January 5, 1918, the same statesman used the following language:

The settlement of the new Europe must be based on such grounds of reason and justice as will give some promise of stability. Therefore it is that we feel that government with the consent of the governed must be the basis of any territorial settlement in this war.

Those fundamental principles laid down by the leading statesmen of Great Britain, if carried out to-day, would without question give absolute independence and freedom to Ireland.

On January 12, 1917, the allied nations, which, of course, includes Great Britain, sent a note to the American Government, from which I take the following quotation:

The allied nations are confident that they are fighting, not for selfish interest, but above all to safeguard the independence of peoples, right, and humanity. * * *

Their war aims necessarily imply the reorganization of Europe, guaranteed by a stable régime and based at once on respect for nationalities and liberty of economic development possessed by all peoples, small and great.

On March 22, 1915, Sir Edward Grey spoke as follows:

We wish the nations of Europe to be free to live their independent lives, working out their own forms of government for themselves and their own national developments, whether they be great States or small States, in full liberty. That is our ideal.

On September 24, 1914, Mr. Winston Churchill laid down the following as one of the aims of Great Britain in the World War:

We want a natural and harmonious settlement which liberates races, restores the integrity of nations, and subjugates no one. * * * Let us war against the principle of one set of Europeans holding down by force and conquest against their wills another section.

And on May 23, 1917, Lord Robert Cecil expressed the same idea in this language:

I laid special stress on the fact that our aims and aspirations were dictated solely by our determination to secure a peace founded on national liberty and international amity, and that all imperialistic aims based on force or conquest were completely absent from our program.

On September 4, 1914, Mr. Bonar Law, in a speech, gave to the world Great Britain's position, as follows:

We are fighting for the moral forces of humanity. We are fighting for the respect of public law and the right of public justice, which are the foundations of civilization. We are fighting, as the prime minister said, for right against might.

On August 6, 1914, Premier Asquith said:

We are fighting to vindicate the principle that small nationalities are not to be crushed, in defiance of international good faith, by the arbitrary will of a strong and overmastering power.

And on September 25, 1914, Premier Asquith, speaking in behalf of Great Britain, used the following language:

It means that room must be found and kept for the independent existence and free development of the smaller nationalities, each with a corporate consciousness of its own.

And again this same statesman, at a banquet at Guildhall, made a speech from which I quote the following:

Perhaps I might say primarily a war for the emancipation of the smaller States * * *.

The peace must be such as will build upon a sure and stable foundation the security of the weak, the liberties of Europe, and the free future of the world.

On January 24, 1917, Mr. Bonar Law said:

What President Wilson is longing for we are fighting for.

And on April 19, 1917, just after America went into the war, Mr. Bonar Law, in a speech, used the following significant phrase:

America's aims and ideals are those of the Allies.

On November 9, 1915, the premier of Great Britain, Mr. Asquith, spoke as follows:

But, be the journey long or short, we shall not pause or falter until we have secured for the smaller States of Europe their charter of independence, and for the world at large its final emancipation from the reign of force.

And on January 7, 1917, this same premier of Great Britain maintained that his Government was in the war for no selfish purpose by using the following language:

We have believed and we have maintained from the first day of the war that we are fighting for no selfish purposes, but in the general service of civilization and humanity.

Sir Edward Grey, on the 23d day of February, 1917, made the following promise:

This war * * * will secure to Europe * * * a peace in which each nation will be able to live its own life.

On February 4, 1917, Lloyd-George, in a political speech in England, said:

The Liberal Party has special interest in the causes for which we are struggling in this great war and the principle that the rights of nations, however small, are as sacred as the rights of the biggest empires.

Mr. Asquith, on September 26, 1917, in a public address, described the war aims of Great Britain as follows:

This war * * * is the creation of a world-wide policy uniting the peoples in a confederation of which justice will be the base and liberty the corner stone.

And on July 26, 1917, Mr. Bonar Law described the unselfishness of Great Britain in the great contest as follows:

We are not only fighting for the freedom of ourselves, we are fighting for the rights of other nations * * * to live their own way * * *. The one thing we are fighting for is peace and security for peace in the time to come.

As late as July 21, 1920, Lloyd-George made a speech in the House of Commons, from which the following is taken:

Poland has chosen her own government by universal suffrage, and it is intolerable that any country from outside should come in and impose upon her a government which she does not want.

Mr. Asquith, on September 29, 1917, described the peace that must come at the close of the war in the following language:

An international system in which there will be a place for great and for small States and under which both alike can be assured a stable foundation and an independent development.

On January 5, 1918, Lloyd-George, at a labor conference, outlined the object of Great Britain, as follows:

The sanctity of treaties must be established; a territorial settlement must be secured based on the right of self-determination, or the consent of the governed.

The English Government issued a statement on August 3, 1918, that was read at all places of entertainment, from which the following quotation is taken:

We are in this war for no selfish ends. We are in it to recover freedom for the nations who have been brutally attacked.

And on August 9, 1918, Lloyd-George delivered an address at the Castle Hotel, from which the following profession of unselfishness is quoted:

* * * The world is a world for the weak as well as for the strong. If not, why did God make little nations?

I want to read one more. On the 5th day of July, 1918, Lloyd-George used this language in an address to American troops:

President Wilson yesterday made it clear what we are fighting for.

What had President Wilson said the day before that was thus given world-wide approval by England's Prime Minister? It was the speech that President Wilson made in a place that is sacred to the patriotic heart of every American. It was on an occasion that is likewise sacred to America, and President Wilson had on this occasion as his audience the entire civilized world. The speech was made at the tomb of George Washington, and in it the President made on behalf of all the Allies the following demand:

The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery * * *. What we seek is the reign of law based upon the consent of the governed, and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind.

While the war was on, and when England was straining every nerve to meet the onslaught of the enemy; when she was doing everything possible to recruit her army, and for the purpose of influencing Irishmen to enlist under her banner, the War Office of Great Britain circulated through Ireland the following circular—and this was after the United States had gone into the war:

"IRELAND AND AMERICA."

The Star-Spangled Banner is unfurled for the fight. There is not the slightest ambiguity about the language of President Wilson:

"Territory, sovereignty, or political relationship—any or all of these—to be settled upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned."

The President also said: "We are concerting with our allies to make not only the liberties of America secure but the liberties of every other people as well."

No man can read these words without applying them to Ireland as well as to Belgium, Poland, the Jugo-Slavs, and the Ukraine. The Allies (and America clearly states this) can not undertake to free the peoples under Germany and Austria and leave other peoples under a system of government which they resent. America, speaking through its President, declares that "the liberties of every other people" are as valued and are to be made secure, aye, as the liberties of America. Will Ireland fight for this freedom? America will see her rights are secured.

The object of this circular was to play upon the friendship between Ireland and the United States. It was to induce Irishmen to fight under the British flag, on the theory that such sacrifices would bring independence and freedom to Ireland. It was holding out to Ireland that if her sons would enlist and fight, the freedom of Ireland would be one of the results of victory; and it was pointed out to Ireland that America was in this fight and that America would see that Ireland obtained justice as one of the results of victory. I wonder, Mr. President, if America will see, according to the British circular, that Ireland obtains her rights and her freedom.

The entire world believed these promises. Relying upon them, many an Irishman enlisted under the British flag and gave up his life at the battle front. Thousands of American boys lie buried on foreign soil who gave their lives in answer to these sacred promises and representations. Hospitals throughout our land are filled with the sick and wounded who went through the fires of hell to make these promises good. The people of the world are bowed down with the burdens of taxation because they believed the promises that were made. Unborn generations must toil and suffer because the leaders of our day in England and America promised this sacred boon to a suffering, bleeding world.

THE PEOPLE ARE BETRAYED.

But the victory that was won on the battle field on account of these sacrifices for humanity was surrendered and given away by the autocrats who sat in secret around the peace table at Versailles. When the truth emanated from that secret chamber it was discovered that the same British statesmen who urged the soldiers on to battle and who proclaimed the doctrine of self-determination to the workers behind the lines had their pockets stuffed with secret treaties, by which in the day of their supremacy and their power every promise made to a civilized world was betrayed and nullified. Ireland found that the freedom and the liberty for which she had struggled for centuries and for which in this war many of her sons had given their lives was not only denied to her but that the very power which this victory gave to her oppressor was to be used in further subjecting her by a cruelty and inhumanity greater than she had ever suffered before. Her sons who dared to ask for freedom were thrown into jail; the homes of her people were wrecked and destroyed; her factories that gave employment to her sons and daughters were confiscated and burned to the ground; and Irishmen were imprisoned and compelled to suffer all manner of cruelties and inhuman punishments. All these things were done by the military forces of Great Britain, under the command of her officers, and in violation of every rule of war, peace, or humanity, and Ireland is to-day held in subjection by the brute force of military rule.

The treatment of the Irish people by the British forces almost beggars description. These military forces now in control resort to methods and practices that violate every rule of civilized warfare and can not be defended before any honest tribunal anywhere. No parallel for existing conditions in Ireland can be found in civilization, and in order to make any comparison with these conditions it would be necessary to go back into the darkest days of barbarism. Human rights are trampled underfoot, property is destroyed almost without limit, the homes and firesides of innocent and unoffending people are invaded in the dead of night, and women and children against whom no charge whatever is made are driven from their firesides only to see their homes and all their earthly possessions going up in flames.

EVIDENCE OF THE BRITISH PEOPLE.

We are not confined alone to the evidence of Irishmen as to the terrible conditions existing in that unhappy land, but there is an abundance of testimony from Englishmen themselves. Men prominent in the councils of Great Britain have unhesitatingly condemned the action of the British Government in Ireland. Various English organizations of men and women have made investigation on the ground and have, without exception, condemned their own Government and have demanded that Ireland be accorded the right to govern herself.

OPINIONS OF ENGLISH LEADERS ON BRITISH POLICY IN IRELAND.

I want to give, now, the opinions of some eminent English statesmen and leaders.

On the 22d day of February this year the Archbishop of Canterbury, the head of the Protestant English Church, in an address in the House of Lords, used this language, speaking of Ireland:

What is now being done is exactly what we condemned the Germans for in Belgium. When the Germans perpetrated cruelties in Belgium it was said that the German people could not be blamed, and the reply was that the German people acquiesced. Exactly the same charge can be brought against the British people if they acquiesce without protest in what is being done in Ireland to-day.

The Rev. Duncan D. MacGregor, moderator of the Presbyterian Church of England, in a speech used this language:

The result of the present policy is that British rule is a byword and a scoff in every country in Europe and across the Atlantic. One might despise the infamous cartoons that appear in the comic papers of every language. They are detestable; but the worst is they are partly true.

For the good name of Britain is it not high time that these crimes, committed in the name of law and order, should cease? Voices of vastly greater authority than mine have uttered their solemn protest, as yet without effect. I wonder whether the whole church of God can not speak with united voice on so clear and crying a moral issue as this.

The bishop of Southwark, in a sermon at St. Swithin's Church on February 20, 1921, used this language:

There is no nation in the world to-day that does not condemn us for our treatment of Ireland. * * * The present conditions in Ireland are bringing disgrace on the British name throughout the world.

Gen. Sir Hubert Gough, in a signed statement published in the papers of Great Britain on the 1st day of March, 1921, used this language:

Law and order has given place to a bloody and brutal anarchy.

That was said by an Englishman, Mr. President, a general in the English Army, who fought through the World War. I repeat:

Law and order has given place to a bloody and brutal anarchy, in which the armed agents of the Crown violate every law in aimless and vindictive and insolent savagery. Is there a single Irish man or woman whose blood does not boil at these things and who does not demand the end of English rule and the right of the Irish to govern themselves?

England has departed further from her own standards and further from the standards even of any nation in the world, not excepting the Turk and the Zulu, than has ever been known in history before. She is doing irreparable harm to the interests of her own Empire and to her own good name by the circulation of accounts which are daily proved to be only too true of what is being done from day to day. In an impoverished and bankrupt world she has recklessly added another area of ruin and destruction.

Lady Sykes, one of the leading women of the world, in a letter published in England on February 21, 1921, used this language:

No crimes or bloodshed committed by the Irish can excuse the methods now being employed by the Government to enforce obedience to English rule and to break the national spirit of the people.

The accepted laws of Christianity and civilization have been set aside and in their place an attempt is being made to crush the Irish people by methods identical with those employed by the Germans in Belgium and universally condemned. I have seen for myself some of the destruction wrought by the forces of the Crown, official and unofficial reprisals, upon the Irish population; I have seen the ruins in Cork city, the blackened remains of creameries, of cooperative stores, of houses in towns and country villages. I have spoken with the mothers of sons who have been shot at sight without trial. I have seen in a prison hospital a boy of 18, against whom there was no charge, who had been beaten about the head and body with the butt ends of rifles till unconscious. I have heard from the lips of a sergeant of police that the place where he was stationed was quiet, but that he had just been out to a village near with some of his men to give a dozen young fellows a good beating.

These things are happening daily, and of the brutal and frequent murders committed by the "Black and Tans" no mention is allowed to be made in the English press.

Mrs. Despard, sister of Lord French:

Deeply as I feel for Ireland, I feel more deeply for England, whose honor is being dragged in the dust and whose flag is being stained with the blood of the innocent. (Address at King's Way Hall, London, Nov. 15, 1920.)

Hon. Henry Herbert Asquith, former prime minister of Great Britain:

While this make believe (the home rule bill) was being pushed through both houses of Parliament, Ireland itself, as you know, was being subjected to an administrative tyranny which for shortsightedness and for cold-bloodedness—there is no question of hot blood about it—has no parallel even in the annals of our almost persistent mishandling of the affairs and fortunes of that unhappy country." (Address before the convention of University Liberal Societies, Jan. 7, 1921.)

Viscount Bryce, former ambassador to the United States:

Ireland is being treated as an enemy whose population is presumed to be hostile. We hear daily of cases in which persons are shot at random, or persons not caught red-handed and against whom no evidence is produced have been shot without trial. Many cases of house burnings and wanton destruction and downright robbery have been admitted. * * * Neither can we afford to ignore the public opinion of other countries. Eminent Americans—warm friends of England—tell me: "It is not the Irish propaganda in the United States that is hurting you there; we are accustomed to that, and we discount it. It is the impression which the news of what is daily happening in Ireland makes upon native Americans who have always been your friends and who know that you can not yield to the demand for Irish independence." Everywhere—in Australia, in Canada, and on the European Continent—the old reputation of Britain for justice and statesmanship is being tarnished and her influence in the world is suffering. (Letter to London Times, Feb. 25, 1921.)

Hon. C. F. G. Masterman, former British minister:

Speaking with a full sense of my responsibility as a former cabinet minister, I declare the evidence is overwhelming that a systematic policy of terror is being pursued. It is being defended by Mr. Lloyd-George, backed up by the flagrant lies of Sir Hamar Greenwood, and organized by officials in high places in Dublin. The attempt is not merely to punish the guilty, but to break the whole spirit of Ireland by inflicting punishment upon people who are as innocent as babes unborn. That was the system which, under the German invasion of Belgium, turned the whole world against Germany. Yet in every particular the things going on in Ireland to-day are a replica—in some cases they are worse than the things the Germans did in Belgium. (Speech at Macclesfield, reported in Christian Science Monitor, Jan. 5, 1921.)

Earl of Denbigh:

One thing is certain to my humble thinking, and that is that the policy of reprisals as now carried on will never be successful, and that Cromwellian brutality will neither be tolerated in this country nor achieve its intended end in Ireland. As an Englishman I feel convinced that if the English people as a whole realized the hateful things done ostensibly in their name, sometimes officially, sometimes by irresponsible and uncontrolled individuals, a wave of indignation and sympathy with Ireland would spread over the country. If allowed to continue, more harm will be done to the British Empire and its reputation abroad than the average man has any idea of. (Signed statement quoted in New York Evening Post, Mar. 17, 1921.)

Lady Bryce (chairman), Lady Frances Balfour, Lady Robert Cecil, Lady Henry Somerset, and others on March 10, 1921, issued the following statement as a call for a protest meeting of several thousand representative British women: "As women citizens, to whom the principles of humanity and of national morality should be peculiarly important, we believe that the system of reprisals practiced in Ireland is uncivilized and un-Christian."

Maj. Gen. Sir F. Maurice: "The result is that our methods in Ireland differ only in degree but not in kind from the methods of the Germans in Belgium. Our national honor is impugned and the honor of the army is smirched, for these outrages are attributed often indiscriminately to the forces of the Crown in general, and foreigners, nor indeed many Irishmen, do not distinguish between the Black and Tans, the auxiliaries, and the regular troops." (Signed statement in London Daily News, Feb. 21, 1921.)

Sir William Watson to Sir Hamar Greenwood:

"No thin, pale fame; no brief and poor renown
Were thy just due. Of these shall wise Time say:
'Chartered for havoc 'neath his rule were they Whose chastisement of guilt was to burn down
The house of innocence in fear-crazed town
And trembling hamlet. While he had his way
Converts uncounted did he make each day
To savage hate of law and King and Crown.'"
(From London Daily News.)

Hon. Walter Runciman (former British minister): "The policy of terrorism in Ireland is similar to that practiced in Belgium by the Germans, and has brought discredit on the British name and interfered with their good relations with America." (Address at Amble, Northumberland, Feb. 28, 1921.)

Lord Henry Cavendish-Bentinck: "In fact, the fullness of waste is written over the Government's whole Irish policy. They have been wasting money, wasting the lives and properties of the Irish people, and frittering away the honor and reputation of the governing and sovereign people. What were they getting for it all? Nothing but disgrace, shame, and defeat." (Speech in House of Commons, Mar. 7, 1921.)

Rev. J. Scott Lidgett (honorable secretary National Council of Evangelical Free Churches of Great Britain): "Even if force, organized, disciplined, and under complete control, were a remedy, to give reign to lawless and undisciplined forces, to take matters into their own hands, to shoot, to burn buildings, to reduce the whole system of government to chaos is the worst application that can possibly be imagined.

"The conscience of this country will not stand it, and if the conscience of this country would stand it, the conscience of the civilized world would rise up in judgment, whatever party be in power.

"We were told by the lord chancellor the other night that the sublimities of the Sermon on the Mount would not carry on the movement in Ireland. That was his answer to the very weighty and Christian speech made by the primate of all England, who, not for the first time, represented the judgment of all his fellow Christians.

"And when the Government, speaking through its supreme law officer, makes light of the Sermon on the Mount as giving the marching orders in Christian civilization he shows that his Government and its policy is founded on a fallacy. It will prove itself equally to be a fallacy in the case of the British Empire generally, and in the special case of Ireland in particular.

"Therefore we denounce and we are out to do our utmost to stop the policy or practice of reprisals." (Address before Assembly of Evangelical Free Churches in Manchester, Mar. 10, 1921.)

Lord Parmorr: "Reprisals in Ireland appear to be wholly inconsistent with the fundamental principles on which the maintenance of law and order in the true sense depends, and the plea of provocation is not admissible. When murder, arson, and theft are allowed to go unpunished, where the offenders are Government agents, there is an end of law and anarchy takes its place." (Presidential address at annual meeting of Peace Society in London, Mar. 9, 1921.)

Lord Hugh Cecil: "The methods alleged to have been adopted by the police in Ireland have no precedent whatever in the story of the restoration of law and order by previous governments in the nineteenth century and can end in no way but the widespread demoralization of the Irish people and, to a degree, the English people as well." (Speech in House of Commons, Mar. 1, 1921.)

Sir Leo Chiozzamoney: "I am constrained to wonder whether what is sometimes called 'the man in the street' casually realizes that whereas if a body of Germans had ambushed our men in the late war and had been captured it would have been contrary to the laws of war to shoot them, but that Irishmen under similar conditions are officially shot, if not already shot unofficially, as at Cork this morning, or that while it does not appear to be on record that the Germans in Belgium ever threatened the Belgians with punishment if they did not actually become informers against their fellow countrymen, the British authorities in Ireland have made it a crime for a friend not to inform against a friend, or even for a woman not to inform against her brother, husband, or lover." (Letter in Westminster Gazette, Mar. 1, 1921.)

Gen. Crozier (commandant of the auxiliary forces of the Royal Irish Constabulary) in his letter of resignation, dated February 19, 1921: "I still consider that theft on the part of policemen in the course of their duties is unpardonable, and I can not honestly associate myself with a force in which such acts are condoned."

Hon. A. Baldwin Raper (Unionist Member of Parliament): "On the following day I was walking down Patrick Street (Cork) between 3.30 and 4.30 when, without the slightest provocation, so far as I could see, a number of shots were fired by Crown forces over the people's heads, as a result of which, I understand, one civilian looking through a window was shot dead.

"It must be obvious to any impartial observer who has had an opportunity of visiting the south of Ireland that measures and incidents such as these can never have the desired effect of bringing peace, and must, in fact, deepen the cleavage between the British and the Irish peoples." (Letter to London Times, Mar. 9, 1921.)

Bishop Gore: "The Government is engaged in the perpetration of crime in Ireland against justice and the foundations of civil liberty and order. This accursed policy of reprisals must not be allowed to go on any longer." (Address at St. Mark's Hall, Feb. 28, 1921.)

Gilbert K. Chesterton: "The whole world thinks that England has gone mad. * * * We are not ruling Ireland. We are simply raiding Ireland, exactly as men raid across a frontier. Our rulers are invading Ireland exactly as the Prussians invaded Belgium." (Article in Manchester Guardian, Mar. 6, 1921.)

Lord Gladstone (in letter to Sir Hamar Greenwood): "I detest your system of reprisals and a policy which gravely and in all parts of the world compromises the fame of Great Britain for justice and common sense." (London Times, Feb. 24, 1921.)

Right Hon. Alexander M. Carlisle, privy councilor (leading shipbuilder in Belfast): "It is not merely that the Government have made mistakes—gross, unpardonable mistakes of which they were fully warned—it is that they have endeavored to hide those mistakes by shameless duplicity and infamous dishonesty." (New York Evening Post, Mar. 17, 1921.)

A. G. Gardiner: "The story of English rule in Ireland is the darkest tragedy on earth, with the single exception of the tragedy in Armenia. We have assassinated the Irish nation for 600 years; we have burned its towns and put its people to the sword. We have destroyed its manufactures. Again and again we have placed in Ireland garrisons to overawe the population. We have driven the people from the soil, so that to-day the population is only one-half what it was a century ago. There is no tale of corruption so sustained, so malignant, in the annals of civilized Europe." (Signed article in London Daily News, Nov. 26, 1920.)

Lord Robert Cecil: "Anything which attacks justice, equity, and freedom attacks the basis on which the British Empire stood. The supremacy of the law is the guaranty of freedom and for that all lovers of freedom in our history have fought. Reprisals are the negation of that supremacy." (New York Evening Post, Mar. 17, 1921.)

Lieut. Gen. Sir Henry Lawson, K. C. B.: "It probably would have been impossible, had I tried, to find out to what extent the policy of collective reprisals so widely carried out by the Black and Tans and cadets was suggested and approved from above. That it received something more than tacit approval is obvious from many public utterances. * * *

"It has further to be remembered that the instruments of this policy had had as a whole no previous touch with Ireland; probably the vast majority had never crossed the Irish Channel before; they were specially enlisted for a repressive job, and in the eyes of most of them they were engaged in a campaign against the Irish people for the suppression of acts of violence against police and soldiery. So far as one can judge they appear to have treated the whole population on the same lines, just and unjust, landlord, shopkeeper, farmer, and their point of view seems to be that of military forces operating in an enemy country against guerrilla warfare, very much like the Germans in France in 1870 and in Belgium in 1914–1918." (Report to Lord Henry Bentinck, chairman Peace With Ireland Council, Dec. 27, 1920.)

Lord Buckmaster (former lord chancellor of Great Britain): "It is only after careful sifting of information that I have come to the conclusion that Government forces have been guilty of murder, robbery, and arson." (Speech in House of Lords, Feb. 22, 1921.)

Lord Northcliffe: "A settlement can only be reached when the English public realize the futility of maintaining by force and under world-wide condemnation an absolute form of government such as we have always been the first to denounce in foreign empires." (Article in Nineteenth Century and After, March, 1921.)

I wish now to take up a few extracts from organizations of English people. I am considering English evidence and confining myself for the time being to the testimony of Englishmen about conditions in Ireland. I wish to read an extract now from a manifesto issued by an organization of educated men in Great Britain, a manifesto on Ireland by leaders of intellectual life in Great Britain. This is the way they commence:

We the undersigned, practicing the arts, the humaner letters, and the abstract sciences, or belonging to the churches and the learned professions of this country, being neither active nor interested politicians, view with profound humiliation the present state of the kingdom of Ireland.

I ask unanimous consent to print as an appendix to my remarks the entire statement, including the signatures. Those who care to examine it will find the leading clergy, the leading professors, the leading universities all over England are appended to the statement which I have quoted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

[See Appendix A.]

Mr. NORRIS. One of the English generals over in Ireland was Gen. Crozier. The world was startled some time ago by his resignation and his return to England. I have a dispatch here from London, taken from the New York World of May 25, giving a synopsis of what Gen. Crozier said when he returned to England and when he demanded an investigation of conditions in Ireland. I quote from the article as follows:

Gen. Crozier asserts cases of murder, arson, looting, and other forms of terrorism were practiced by the Crown forces during the six months he held his Irish command, and it was in consequence of his determination to enforce discipline and put an end to police crime that his position was deliberately rendered impossible and resignation forced upon him.

In other words, where there was a general who wanted to stop the lawlessness, the barbarity, and the criminal conduct of British military forces he was compelled to resign. He states in the article an instance where members of the British military forces disguised themselves as members of the republican army and robbed the post office. He states another case where a priest was deliberately murdered and his body buried in a vault and false reports given out on account of it. He tells somewhat of the truth about what happened at Croke Park, where the military authorities interrupted a football game and shot promiscuously into the crowd and killed a great many people. I shall not take the time to read it, but it is from the highest English authority, one of the English generals. I ask that the entire article be printed as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

[See Appendix B.]

Mr. NORRIS. There is in the world an international organization of women's clubs, the International League. Every Government or country has an organization that is a part of the international organization. The British branch, composed entirely of English women of the International League, all English citizens, at a meeting appointed a committee of 10 women to go to Ireland and make an investigation on the ground. They went. I hold in my hand a copy of their report from which I desire to quote. They said in one place:

The Government campaign against the Sinn Fein is carried on in the following way:

1. Terrorism.
2. Destruction of Irish agriculture and manufactures and trades.
3. Propaganda.

They wind up their report by saying:

We therefore advocate the immediate liberation of Irish political prisoners.

It might be well to pause here and say that the jails and internment camps in Ireland are filled with this kind of prisoners.

We therefore advocate the immediate liberation of Irish political prisoners.

That is a unanimous report signed by all the members of the committee and all English, let me add.

There is another international organization of a religious nature, the Society of Friends, the Quakers of the world. The international organization is composed of delegates from the various national entities of the international body. The British branch of the international organization of Friends or Quakers selected a committee, all Englishmen, all living in England, to go to Ireland and investigate conditions on the ground. I have before me a copy of the report of that committee. I wish to read an extract or two from it.

At its September meeting the executive committee of the Society of Friends (England) had before it the disturbed condition of Ireland. After serious consideration it was decided to send a deputation to visit the country to gather facts and impressions and report to a subsequent meeting as to the possibility of relief, reconstruction, and reconciliation. The deputation numbered three, of whom the writer was one. It may fairly be claimed that they went with open minds, anxious to receive light from whatever quarter it may shine. It is thought that some account of what was seen and what impressions were received may be of general interest.

That is the introduction to the report. It shows who they were and the scope of their work. I wish now to read the conclusion of their report:

As Friends we must deplore the violence and the bloodshed on both sides that take place in such a state of war. As English citizens we must surely chiefly feel the shame of the direct responsibility of our Government for the policy of reprisal by the so-called black and tan, led by their officers, during which town after town is being ravaged and burnt and women and children are driven terror stricken into the fields and weeds to seek safety at night.

That from a religious organization, from the Quakers of England, who have been there and made investigation on the ground.

There is still another English organization that sent a deputation to Ireland. One of the great political parties of England, the Labor Party, decided that they would investigate what was going on in Ireland, and they sent a committee over to Ireland to make an investigation. I have in my hand a copy of their report. I wish to read a few extracts from it. In one place in their report they say:

In some places members of the Crown forces have compelled shopkeepers to obliterate the Irish signs over their doors and windows. This, we know, has happened at Killarney, Pralee, and Listowel. Such petty tyranny creates ill feeling.

One species of terrorism to which reference must be made is the publication in the newspapers or by means of typewritten circulars of notices threatening punishment to the general public if certain things are done or not done.

In another place they say:

The following statement was given to the commission in evidence by a lad of 18 who had been searched and a post-card photograph of the late lord mayor of Cork found in his possession.

Bear in mind this young man, this lad, was found having in his possession a post-card photograph of the lord mayor of Cork. That was his offense. This is the statement:

The Black and Tan who had searched me said I had a photo of MacSwiney. The man in charge told me to go down on my knees. I did not go down. He struck me across the face with his clenched fist. Then he told me again to go down on my knees. I did not go down, and three or four of the Black and Tans who were around pushed me down on my knees. The leader then took a bound book about the size of a novel from under his arm. He gave it to me and told me to hold it above my head and repeat the following words: "I swear that I will have nothing to do with the Sinn Fein in future." I took no notice. Then the leader of the Black and Tans put the barrel of his rifle to my forehead and told me to repeat the oath. All this time I had said nothing. I repeated the oath. The leader then said, "Say 'God bless the R. I. C.'" I said nothing, and the leader struck me with his fist on the face and said, "Repeat 'God bless the R. I. C.' three times." I said "God bless the R. I. C." Then he took a large framed photo of De Valera from under his arm and told me to spit in De Valera's face three times. I took no notice. The leader again struck me on the face with his fist. I made an attempt to do what I was told, but didn't actually do it, and one of the Black and Tans said, "They are very dry." The leader again struck me on the face. Then they all went away.

In another place in the report this committee say:

This rough and brutal treatment of women—

They had been describing some brutal treatment of women just above this quotation—

This rough and brutal treatment of women is by no means the worst that is to be said against men in the service of the British Crown. It is, however, extremely difficult to obtain direct evidence of incidents affecting females, for the women of Ireland are reticent on such subjects. The following case, which came under our notice, is, we fear, but an isolated instance: A young woman who was sleeping alone in premises which were raided by the Crown forces was compelled to get out of bed and her night dress was ripped open from top to bottom.

In another place in this report it is stated:

The chief secretary—

That is, speaking of the member of the British cabinet, the chief secretary for Ireland—

The chief secretary has identified himself with a policy which is a disgrace to the British people and which we believe to be unparalleled in this country. The criminal nature of this policy of violence is clearly seen by considering the essential features of reprisals and violence.

In another place they say:

Months of oppression, coercion, and physical violence can not but have far-reaching effects upon the people who suffer. The future alone will bring to light the complete results of the awful events which have followed in rapid succession in Ireland, particularly during the past 12 months. We may, however, point to some of the consequences which are now obvious to all who have come into close touch with the Irish people.

It is clear that the terrorism which prevails has had serious effects upon the health of people. We may leave out of account the obvious consequences likely to follow to the members of a household who have been the horrified witnesses of bloodshed and violence in their own homes, and consider the effects of the terror upon those who have never experienced such an ordeal. There is medical testimony to show that the fear inspired by Black and Tans and auxiliary police has had the most adverse effects upon pregnant women. Children naturally suffer from the effects of a terror-laden atmosphere, and we are informed that the number of such diseases as Saint Vitus's dance has considerably increased. A large section of the population is "all nerves." The strain has begun to tell, especially in those areas where the excesses of the Crown forces have been most frequent.

Let me read a portion of the conclusion of this report:

We can not close this report without an appeal to the British labor movement and to the British public. Things are being done in the name of Britain which must make her name stink in the nostrils of the whole world. The honor of our people has been gravely compromised. Not only is there a reign of terror in Ireland which should bring a blush of shame to every British citizen, but a nation is being held in subjection by an empire which has proudly boasted that it is the friend of small nations. Let the people of Britain raise their voices in a united demand for the rescue of the Irish people from the rule of force and for the establishment of peace and freedom and a new brotherhood between the peoples of the British Isles. Only by repudiating the errors of the past and the infamies of the present can the democracy of Great Britain recover its honor. Only by granting to Ireland the freedom which is her due can our people fulfill their great responsibilities toward our sister nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print as an appendix to my remarks the entire report of that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

[The report will be found as Appendix C at the end of the speech of Mr. NORRIS.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have been giving the Senate English evidence. In every instance I have stated what it was and the person who or the organization which gave it. I could continue to pile that evidence mountain high, but I think I have given enough to show that the great common people of England, if they could only know, if they could only realize, what is being done in Ireland in the name of Great Britain, would, every one of them, as this report says, "blush with shame" or would rise up as one man and demand that these cruelties and barbarities cease.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Did I understand the Senator from Nebraska to say earlier in his address the testimony which has been furnished by various prominent English men and English women and various organizations from which he has quoted had been denied publication in the English newspapers?

Mr. NORRIS. Considering the statements themselves, I should judge they had been, but some of them were published in certain newspapers in England.

THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND.

Mr. President, Ireland has never voluntarily submitted to the rule of Great Britain. For centuries she has been crying aloud for independence and striving to be free. During all these years she has been held in subjection—in practical national servitude—by the superior military power of Great Britain. After the Great War, when it became evident that the promises made to weak nations were not going to be kept, when it became apparent that the very power the victory gave to Great Britain was going to be used to further subdue and hold the Irish race in subjection without their consent, the Irish people formally proclaimed their independence. This occurred in January, 1919. The members of Parliament elected from Ireland, with the exception of a few in Ulster, proceeded to form a government. They elected a president and established various heads of departments similar to our Cabinet, and, with the exception above noted, all the officials—county, district, and municipal—recognized and gave allegiance to the new government. They proceeded to carry on the business of government in Ireland through the instrumentality of these officials, who were elected under laws that had long been on the statute books, and the courts and the county and municipal officials, under these laws that had existed for many years, proceeded to function and do business. Among other things, an army was organized and trained. All the activities of government were in full force and effect, and all Ireland needed was to be let alone by the balance of the world. A new government, complete in all details from top to bottom, was functioning and performing all the public duties necessary in any civilized country.

Then began a program of intimidation and terror, and this program increased in barbarity and inhumanity as time went on. It was made illegal for anyone in Ireland to bear arms. Under the decrees of the British Government it became criminal for any body of men to train in uniform. It was a crime to be found in possession of any arms or munitions. It was unlawful for any Irishman to have in his possession any literature, letters, or memoranda that in any way were connected with the new government. It soon became impossible, on account of the British military power which spread over Ireland, for the officials of the government who were elected under laws that had long been in existence to function or to perform their duties. A systematic and well-ordered reign of terror was planned and carried into execution. Men against whom there existed any suspicion of sympathy for the new government were hunted down as criminals. They were arrested, confined in prison, and treated with a cruelty and inhumanity that must forever put the brand of disgrace upon the military authorities of Great Britain. Under the pretense of hunting for arms and munitions private homes were raided during all hours of the night. The inmates were driven out into the street, the windows were smashed, the furniture destroyed, and in many cases the houses with all their contents were burned to the ground. Men were taken from their homes, stripped, flogged, and all kinds of punishments inflicted upon them in an attempt to compel them to divulge information of the whereabouts of some prominent official of the Irish government.

RAIDS BY THE MILITARY.

Nearly fifty thousand instances of the raiding of private homes by the British military authorities occurred in the year 1920. Almost all of these raids took place in the nighttime. In most instances the windows were smashed, the doors were broken, the furniture was destroyed, and in many cases the houses were burned to the ground. It was part of the plan to terrorize the Irish people—to break them down. The home of every man who was in any way prominent in the Irish movement for freedom was a special target. Very often no ostensible reason for the raids appeared, and there could have been no other object than to terrorize the people in general and the inmates of the home raided in particular.

On the 27th of November, 1920, between 4 and 5 o'clock in the morning, the house of Alderman Coughlan, at 19 Pine Street, Cork, was raided by the British military authorities. It was not the first time this house had been raided by the soldiers. On this occasion it was apparent from what occurred that they were searching for the alderman. There was no crime charged against him; there was no warrant out for his arrest, but he was a member of the city council, and the city council was loyal to the new Irish republic. The alderman was not at home. He was, as the usual phrase goes in Ireland, "on the run," which means that the military authorities were hunting for him. He and his family live above a store, on the second floor of the building, and operate the store on the ground floor—a very common condition in the cities of Ireland. The soldiers broke in the glass windows of the storeroom and rushed upstairs, compelling Mrs. Coughlan to get out of bed and dress in their presence. The soldiers carried revolvers and flashlights. They made a complete search of the house for the husband, but were unable to find him. They searched all the bureau drawers for papers and documents. They robbed the place of more than $100 worth of tobacco and then left. It was a common thing for these soldiers when they raided a place to supply themselves with anything they needed, and if the residence raided was over a liquor store they always imbibed freely of the liquor, and as a rule carried away with them that which they did not drink or destroy.

I might mention the case of Mrs. O'Grady. She is a woman of international reputation and is known by many American people. She has devoted her life to the development of the poultry industry, and in 1913 took a special prize of £1,000 that had been offered by the Poultry World. Mrs. O'Grady lives with her husband near the city of Cork. Between midnight and daylight on the night of March 20, 1920, her house was raided by the British military authorities. In a sworn affidavit that she makes she says that they broke into the house and came into her room while she was still in bed. They demanded that she get out of bed, and she asked that they leave the room while she dressed herself. This they refused to do, and made her get out of bed and dress in their presence. They were armed with revolvers and guns. They tore everything to pieces in the residence, and made a complete search of the house, ostensibly to find arms or munitions and documents. Her husband was placed under arrest. Mrs. O'Grady had £63 in money in the house, which money the soldiers took. This was money that she had saved from her poultry business. Jewelry and silverware to the value of several hundred dollars were taken by the soldiers and carried away. Furniture in the house was broken and destroyed. The jewels which were stolen, Mrs. O'Grady testifies, were mostly inherited from her dead mother. Her husband, after being held in jail for five or six days, was released without any charge ever having been lodged against him. It might be well to add that Mrs. O'Grady has a son who enlisted and fought under the British flag in the recent World War.

On the 28th day of October, 1920, the residence of Mr. Courtney, in Cork, was raided by the British soldiers. The raid took place about 2 o'clock in the morning. Mr. Courtney in a sworn affidavit says that there were 16 soldiers in the party, 6 of whom were officers. They broke in the door and smashed the windows. They kept him and his wife standing in the cold in their night clothing while they proceeded to cross-examine them. The soldiers tore up the floors of the house; they emptied the contents of cupboards on the floor; they took family photographs and tore them to pieces. They asked Mr. Courtney if he was a loyalist, and he bravely said he was not. They asked him if he was a republican, and he admitted it. One of the soldiers placed a revolver at his right temple and demanded that he tell the whereabouts of a man whom they seemed to be desirous of capturing. He refused to give them the information. Then they unbuttoned his clothing and, placing a revolver over his heart, threatened to shoot him instantly unless he gave them the information they demanded. While the revolver of one soldier was thus placed against him another soldier discharged his revolver, with the evident intention of frightening Mr. Courtney and his wife, who was standing by dressed only in her night clothes. When Mr. Courtney still declined to give them any information they ordered him to dress, and took him away. They marched him down the street in the darkness, prodding him with bayonets, and making threats against his life. After they had taken him away from home, they went through the same performance again in an effort to induce him to give them information. When he was finally liberated and went home, about daylight, he found his wife in a dazed condition, still in her night clothes. She was unable to speak, sitting among the torn and shattered fragments and other belongings of their home. She, of course, never expected to see her husband again. In most instances where the soldiers took away a member of a household, it was the last time that any of the members of the family saw him alive.

On the 14th day of October, 1920, John Egar, a clerk in the city hall at Cork, was searched when a military raid was made upon the offices in the city building. Upon his person was found a ballot ticket for a drawing, the prize at which drawing was to be a 32-caliber revolver and 50 rounds of ammunition, and because he was found in possession of this ticket he was arrested. He was taken to the military barracks and placed in prison. The military authorities attempted to get some information from him, which he declined to give. He was then locked up and kept without food until the next day, and was told that he would be killed unless he gave the information which they desired. He was kept in a cell for 14 days, and when they were unable to extract any information from him he was finally released.

On the 27th day of August, 1920, at about 1 o'clock in the morning, a raid was made by 25 soldiers upon the Buckley home in Ballyedmond, Middleton. The house was thoroughly searched by the soldiers, but nothing was found. Nevertheless the two Buckley boys were placed under arrest, both of them handcuffed and taken to the barracks. The next morning they were placed in a lorry with several soldiers, both young men handcuffed as before, and while driving along were shot by the soldiers. One of the boys lived only a few minutes after being shot, and the other was so badly injured that he has practically lost the use of his right leg and right arm. No charge was ever filed against either of these men, and no claim has ever been made that either one of them violated any law.

On the night of the 28th of September, 1920, the home of Patrick Noonan was raided. The soldiers placed the son of Mr. Noonan under arrest. There were no firearms in the house, no charge of any kind was made against these people, but at the point of a revolver the young man was compelled to hold up his hands. While they held him in this condition other soldiers hit him in the face with their fists and with the butt ends of their revolvers. They searched his person and found nothing. All this happened in the presence of his father and mother. Then the officer in charge ordered that he be taken out of the house and shot. This order was obeyed, and the young man was taken out and shot three or four times and then left for dead. Although he had a very close escape, he finally recovered. I have seen the sworn affidavits of both the father and the son, in which they allege the facts to be as I have stated.

On November 23, 1920, Mr. Coleman, a business man in Cork, who owns a mineral-water factory, and in connection with his business operates a bar, refused to sell liquor to the soldiers, for the reason that they usually became intoxicated, and in a state of drunkenness committed all kinds of depredations. On this date at about 3 o'clock in the morning, Mr. Coleman was awakened by a loud pounding upon the door of his place of business. He and his wife both got up and came downstairs. He opened the door, and there, in the presence of his wife, without any excuse whatever, he was shot dead. In addition to his wife, he left two children, the youngest child being about 5 months old. No claim was even made that this man was connected in any way with the new Irish republic. His only public affiliation was that he was a member of the Cork Industrial Development Association, and the only offense that he committed, even in the eyes of the British soldiers, was to refuse to supply them with intoxicating liquor. This incident was only a part of the general reckless plan of terrorizing the people.

Kevin Barry, 18 years of age, a Dublin medical student, was cruelly tortured before he was hanged in October, 1920. He was arrested as one of the participants in a raid made upon the British soldiers. While he was in jail awaiting the execution of his sentence, he made an affidavit before a justice of the peace who went into the prison for the purpose of taking Mr. Barry's affidavit. In this affidavit he states that shortly after his arrest he was asked to give the names of his companions in the raid. This he refused to do. A bayonet was then placed at his stomach and he was told that he would be killed at once unless he answered the questions he was asked and gave the names of his companions. He again refused. His face was then turned to the wall and the bayonet was placed at his back. Again he was notified that death would result if he refused to give the officers the information they demanded. He still refused. Let me quote from his affidavit:

He (referring to the officer in command) ordered the sergeants to put me face down on the floor and twist my arm. I was pushed down on the floor after my handcuffs were removed by the sergeant, who went for the bayonet. When I lay on the floor one of the sergeants knelt on the small of my back, the other two placed one foot each on my back and left shoulder, and the men who knelt on me twisted my right arm, holding it by the wrist with one hand while he held the hair with the other to pull back my head. The arm was twisted from the elbow joint.

Mr. Barry states in his affidavit that this twisting continued for five minutes, and that during all this time the officer in charge was demanding of him that he answer the questions regarding his associates. But, like thousands of other Irishmen under the same kind of conditions, he still remained true and refused to divulge any information. He was told, so he says in his affidavit, that he would be let off if he gave the information, but even with the promise of freedom on one hand and the practical certainty of a conviction on his coming trial on the other, he remained steadfast and kept his silence. This treatment occurred before Mr. Barry was tried, but the affidavit in which he describes the treatment was made just after he had been given official notice of his conviction, and that the date of his execution had been fixed for the following Monday, so it must be said in support of his affidavit that it was made with the practical certainty of almost immediate death.

I have an affidavit made by Thomas Hales, of Bandon, County Cork, who described the treatment that he and another prisoner by the name of Harte received at the hands of their British captors. The affidavit of Mr. Hales is not directly corroborated by other witnesses, and I have not seen or talked with any person having personal knowledge of the treatment that these two men received. Mr. Hales in his affidavit, however, gives dates, places, and the names of other witnesses who saw part of the treatment that was given them, and he also gives the name of the British officer who had charge of him while he was under arrest. Then, too, the incidents described therein are so similar to the experience of so many hundreds of other prisoners that I have no hesitancy in giving it publicity. The affidavit was given to me by Lord Mayor O'Callaghan, of Cork.

According to this affidavit, Mr. Hales and Mr. Harte were arrested on the 27th day of July, 1920, at a farmhouse occupied by a man named Hurley. Hales was taken to an outhouse by British soldiers under the command of Capt. Kelly, where all of his clothes were removed and searched for documents. Hales says that some documents were found in his clothing, and that the officers claimed to have found some cartridges, but Hales denies that he had any cartridges in his possession. With Capt. Kelly was a Lieut. Keogh.

After Hales and Harte had been stripped, their hands were tied behind their backs with leather straps and other straps put around their necks and mouths. While in this condition, Lieut. Keogh struck Hales several times in the face and on the body with his fist. After a while the two men were again dressed and their hands tied behind their backs as before. They were then tied together and marched 200 yards and put in a lorry. During this time they were continually prodded with bayonets and Hales was hit in the nose by the butt end of a gun. Hales said that he was nearly blind from blood that was running down his face from his injuries. They were taken to the military barracks and lined up to be shot. While they were still tied with their hands behind their backs the soldiers hit them with their fists. Hales affirms that his sight was getting dim owing to the loss of blood and that he was exceedingly weak. They were pounded and pummeled while they were marched around the yard of the barracks. Their arrest took place about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and this treatment continued until after dark. He says that about midnight he was taken to another room and that there were six British officers present, four of whom he names in his affidavit. While his hands were still tied he was informed that he was about to be tried. I quote from his affidavit:

> Kelly took up a book which he said was a Bible, and opened it and placed it in my hands behind my back. He told me to repeat the oath which he was going to say. I said, "For what purpose?" He said, "We want your name, and for you to answer other questions on oath. If you do not, you will be handed over to the R. I. C., and they will quickly identify you and deal with you." I, of course, was well known to Capt. Kelly. He had seen me many times before, and of course knew my correct name. I had previously given a false name when I was arrested—that was before I knew Kelly was present. I said, "I have no objection to giving my name." They let my trousers down round my feet, my hands still being behind my back. "Now," said Kelly, "repeat the following words after me." He then started saying some form of oath and included in it the name of the Blessed Virgin. I did not repeat the name of the Blessed Virgin, and two of the officers took their canes and beat me on my bare legs for about five minutes. I was powerless to do anything. Kelly then asked my name. I said "Tom Hales." He said, "You are commander of a brigade." I said I was one time. He asked me who was the man next in command to me. I said I refused to tell him. I said, "You are foreigners to me, but I appeal to you, if you are gentlemen, to go ahead and get on with the shooting part of it. I am quite ready." Kelly then told one of the officers to go out and get the pliers. He then said, "You are an anarchist and a murderer. You have organized all the murder and attacks on barracks in this part of the country." He said, "Where were you on Sunday? Were you at mass, and at what mass?" I said, "I was at mass at Rossmore." He then asked me was I not responsible for raiding the training camp at Glandore last year. I refused to answer. The two officers then gave me about 40 cuts each on my bare legs. Kelly then said, "Will you refuse to tell me was Prof. Gerald Sullivan commander of the camp?" I told him I did not know such a man. He said, "You are a damned liar." The two officers then gave me vicious blows on the leg, and the blood was flowing down my legs from several wounds in them. (Dr. Shannon, civilian doctor of Cork prison, saw the scars that were on my legs.) The scars were visible for three weeks after this night's event. * * * He asked me what rank did John Buckley of Bandon hold in the Irish Republican Volunteers. I said, "He is a builder, and a good Sinn Feiner at that." I was again viciously whipped for the statement. He said, "What position does your brother John hold and where is he staying?" I said, "I refuse to give you any information about him." He then turned to the officer whom he had sent for the pliers, and he started bending and twisting and pinching my fingers at the back. He gripped them at the back, placing one portion of the pinchers against one side of my nail and the other portion of the pinchers against the other. He brought the blood to the tops of several of my fingers, and for some time afterwards my fingers were black on the tops, owing to congealed blood there. I was feeling extremely weak, almost fainting, and the blood was dropping down my legs. I was asked several questions about other individuals and about military matters, but I refused to give any information. Kelly also put the pinchers on my thighs, but my senses were becoming quite numb.

Later on in the affidavit he states that his hands were untied and his trousers were pulled up and that they were "sopping wet with blood." He was ordered to stand up because his knees were trembling, but he was almost too weak to stand. Lieut. Kelly then struck him a terrific blow in the face with his fist. He hit him several times in different parts of the body and knocked four teeth out of his upper jaw. He was then knocked down on the ground absolutely exhausted and fainting. Mr. Hales states that his comrade, Harte, was treated in a similar fashion and that the effect on him was such that it caused him to go insane.

The next morning at daybreak, on the 28th day of July, he and Harte were again mistreated. They were put up against a wall and notified that they were to be shot. They asked if they might be permitted to see a chaplain, but were refused. The officer placed a pistol against the temple of Hales and said:

> One question, and on the answer of this question depends your life. Give me the names of the six battalions.

To which Mr. Hales affirms he replied:

> Even if I knew the names of the six battalions, I would not tell you.

He was then informed by Kelly that he would give him one more chance, and that if he did not give him the names of the battalions he would shoot him dead, and Hales still refused to give the information. After that Hales says they were taken to the hospital, where, he states, they were given good treatment. The prisoners were afterwards tried and sentenced to two years at hard labor.

In order to show the reckless conduct of the British military forces, it might be of interest to consider the story of Emil Pezolt, an American citizen. Mr. Pezolt was born in the city of Chicago, and he is 21 years of age, a bright, intelligent, fine-looking young man. During the recent war he enlisted in the Marine Corps and when he was mustered out at the close of the war he went into the merchant marine and shipped out of San Francisco to various places on one of the American Shipping Board's vessels. On November 6, 1918, he shipped on the vessel West Cannon with a cargo of wheat from Portland, Oreg., to Cork, and he arrived in Cork on the 17th day of November. He was a junior engineer on this ship and his ship remained in Cork for five weeks. He says that when he went ashore it was a common thing for him to be held up by the military authorities. It got to be quite common to hear the word "Halt" and the cry "Hold up your hands." It was a very common occurrence to be thus held up by the British authorities and searched. Mr. Pezolt had in his possession, of course, a seaman's passport and, as a rule, when they discovered who he was and that he belonged to a ship in port he was permitted to go. The harbor town formerly known as Queenstown and now called Cove by the Irish, which, as I understand it, is really a suburb of Cork, was in a very dilapidated condition.

Whole streets of stores had their windows broken in and had been looted, plate-glass windows were smashed, and all kinds of depredations were committed by the military authorities. Everybody on the ship, this man says, understood that they must not walk the streets of Cork with their hands in their pockets without danger of being shot. He states that it was a very common thing to be stopped and halted by the soldiers. When they were stopped they were compelled to hold their hands above their heads while they were being searched. He says he has seen instances where whole crowds were held up and all of them were compelled to hold up their hands until the entire crowd was searched. On December 11, 1920, this man was held up while on the way to his ship by three British soldiers. He was compelled to hold his hands up above his head while they searched him. They found his seaman's passport, and he told them he was an American citizen and that he belonged to a ship in port, to which ship he was then going. Each of the three soldiers pressed a gun up against his body, and while they were thus holding him up and searching him other soldiers came upon the scene and one of the soldiers struck him in the face with brass knuckles. They took everything that he had on his person, including his fountain pen, his comb, his passport, and all the money that he had. They beat him and knocked him down several times and kicked him while he was down. Part of the time he was unconscious on account of his head striking the sidewalk when he fell. They backed him up against a wall and held him there. They told him to go, and then made him come back. They did this several times, all the time abusing him with vile and indecent language. He was dragged on the ground, his clothing was torn, his face was bruised and covered with blood. Complaint was made to the American consul, and through him to the British authorities, but it was claimed in reply that they were unable to identify the soldiers who were guilty of this dastardly conduct. He had on his person British money to the value of $20 and $10 in American money, all of which was taken.

A former member of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who resigned from the force because he could not conscientiously be a party to the cruelties of British military rule, has made an affidavit of instructions that were given to him and others as to their conduct and as to their duty. Among a great many other things testified to in this affidavit of a cruel and inhuman nature the officer in charge in giving instructions issued the following:

If the persons approaching carry their hands in their pockets and are in any way suspicious looking, shoot them down. You may make mistakes occasionally and innocent persons may be shot, but that can not be helped and you are bound to get the right persons sometimes.

In carrying out their program of terror and shooting promiscuously at houses and residences without any particular object in view except to frighten the people and break down their will and determination for a free country, the case of Mrs. Quinn is an illuminating incident. The shooting of Mrs. Quinn was reported in the daily papers of November 6, 1920, and was afterwards admitted by Sir Hamar Greenwood, a member of the British Cabinet, so there can be no doubt of the truth of the report. Mrs. Quinn was standing near her house in Gort, a small Irish village. The military authorities were passing in a motor lorry and following the usual practice of shooting indiscriminately at houses along the street. Mrs. Quinn was holding a small child in her arms and was within two months of another confinement. She was shot by the soldiers from the lorry as they were passing rapidly through the street. She fell to the ground, and, while severely wounded and bleeding profusely, she crawled into her house, dragging her baby with her, and died a few hours afterwards, after suffering great agony, and during which time her husband fainted, and the gathering neighbors and friends grieved over her prostrate form.

I would like to tell the story of John Derham. John Derham was a member of the town council of Balbriggan. Balbriggan is a little town of 2,500 people. It was inhabited mostly by laboring people, who earned their livelihood and supported their families from the employment they were given by a hosiery factory located in that town. Mr. Derham had a wife and eight children. He was a shopkeeper, and he and his family lived in the rear and in the second story of the stone building where his business was conducted. On the night of September 20, 1920, between 11 and 12 o'clock, after he and his family had gone to bed, their home was raided by the British military authorities. They broke in the windows and doors, and 15 or 20 soldiers came into the house. The family did not have time to fully dress. Mr. Derham was taken from his family by the soldiers, rushed into the street, pounded upon the head with the butt end of muskets and revolvers, struck in the face by the soldiers, insulted in every possible way, and marched to the barracks. He was bareheaded and barefooted. He suffered all kinds of abuse and ill treatment during the night.

When he got to the barracks he found two of his neighbors there. One of them was the father of seven children, and with him were two of his children, one 4 years old and the other 3, both barefooted and clothed only in their little nightdresses. These two neighbors during the night were both killed; not shot, but prodded with bayonets until they died. One of them was stabbed many times in almost all parts of the body. One had a bayonet gash in each hip so that the blood ran down each leg, and finally bayonets were thrust through their bodies. Between 6 and 7 o'clock, Derham was released and in a half-dazed condition he wandered back to his home. He found it burned to the ground; nothing but the stone walls were standing; all of his property, all of his furniture, and practically all of the clothing of himself and family had been absolutely destroyed. Seventeen other houses in the same row with Mr. Derham's residence were destroyed in the same way. The inhabitants had been driven out without time even to fully dress, and all their belongings were fed to the flames.

In addition to this, there were 56 residences in this town destroyed; nearly all the windows of the other houses were broken into; business houses were burned and other places of business had been entered by the soldiers, such as grocery stores and the like, and the entire stock of goods dumped on the floor and trampled under foot by the soldiers. Nearly all the women and children of the town had been driven out of their homes, and several of the people had been killed. In desperation and in fright the women of the town fled to the country carrying their babies dressed only in their night clothes, while the larger children, barefooted and nearly naked, were clinging to them frightened beyond description. It was a cold, frosty September night, and hundreds of barefooted and scantily clothed women and children spent the night in the fields resting beside hayricks, crouching in barns and outbuildings, all expecting that their husbands, fathers, and sons had probably met death at the hands of the military. The next day many of the wanderers, without food and suffering from cold, went back to the deserted village and to their ruined homes.

During every night for several days thereafter the military kept up a continual firing of guns and muskets and bombs. They carried gasoline to the hosiery factory and then set it on fire, and it burned to the ground with all its machinery and all its contents. The people had not only been rendered homeless and naked, but the only means of employment by which the men of the town supported their families had been taken away. Several of the children and women died a few days later on account of the exposure. The inhabitants had to be supported by charity and by a people who were already suffering near to starvation, but this was not the end of it. When the good people of the town gathered together the dead bodies of members of their families, the military added insult to injury by interfering with the last rites that it was desired to hold over the bodies of the dead. The interference with funerals by the military is not an exception, but is the general rule. When the people meet at the place of worship to pay the last respect to departed relatives they are met there by the glittering bayonets of British soldiers. The colors of the Irish republic are not permitted to be placed upon the coffins of those who die that the republic might live. The soldiers enter the places of worship and see that no demonstration of hostility to the British Government takes place. The officer in command usually announces the number that can march in the funeral procession, and those who are permitted to go are continually within the range of pointed revolvers and machine guns. British motor lorries and British tanks armed to the teeth march with the funeral procession and stand guard around the open grave to prevent the friends of Irish freedom from making any demonstration in favor of their own liberty.

Is it possible that this can happen in this day of civilization without at least a solemn protest going up from civilized humanity? Can such conduct be paralleled or equaled anywhere in the world? Does Belgium offer anything to compare to it? Is the cruelty and the inhumanity of the Turk in the same class? Can we find a parallel anywhere this side of the days of barbarism? And all this is happening just after we have fought a victorious war for the self-determination of peoples, for the rights of the poor and the protection of the weak. Not only this but it is taking place under the direction of the military officers who represent the great nation that during all this strife proclaimed so loudly to all the world that the peace would bring us the millenium of justice and equality.

THE FUNCTIONING OF THE IRISH GOVERNMENT.

As I have stated before, immediately after the declaration of independence by the Irish people the new government became an actual reality in all details. The executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments were completely organized, and the people of Ireland, with the exception of portions of Ulster, declared allegiance to the new government with practical unanimity. There was more universal and unqualified allegiance to the new government than existed in our own country when our forefathers issued the Declaration of Independence. This proposition has been officially admitted by the British Government. On Tuesday, the 15th day of February, 1921, in a debate in the House of Commons, Lloyd-George, the prime minister of Great Britain, used the following language:

That was the condition of things a few months ago, and that is not all. The Irish republican organization had all the symbols and they had all the realities of a government. The courts of the Crown were superseded. They were deserted by witnesses; they were boycotted by jurors. Jurors never came there and litigants never appeared. Sinn Fein courts were held openly, attended by litigants, jurors, and advocates, and their decisions were respected.

Remember that is Lloyd-George. Do not forget the date. He said that on the 15th day of February, 1921. He was speaking of the condition that had preceded that time, as Senators will note from the quotation.

In addition to this admission by Great Britain's prime minister, I quote from an affidavit sworn to by Gen. MacReady, the British general, and filed in the John Allen case. I read as follows:

> The said rebel forces are organized as a trained and disciplined military force under a scheme modeled on the former organization of the British Army, divided up into brigades, battalions, and companies. The chiefs of the said rebel organization issue military orders, have a general headquarters, and are continuously engaged in levying guerrilla warfare against the forces of the Crown. The scheme of the said warfare does not entail fighting in distinctive uniforms or in accordance with laws of war, but under a system of guerrilla attacks in which inhabitants, apparently pursuing peaceful avocations, suddenly come together and carry out guerrilla operations, which often result in the death of, or serious injuries to, members of His Majesty's forces and police at the hands of the people who are posing as peaceful civilians.

The Irish Republic continued to function and is functioning to-day, except where it is interferred with by the army of Great Britain. At first all the operations of the government were conducted in public. Courts were held in the courthouses. Aldermen met in the city halls. But gradually the forces of Great Britain were spread over the country and the governmental operations of the proper and legally elected officials were more or less secret. To an ordinary person it is difficult to imagine how a court can perform any of its functions when the officials are being hunted down by the military forces.

We can hardly see, for instance, how such a court would be able to render a judgment of imprisonment in a criminal case with any hope that the person could be confined in prison, or that losing parties in a civil suit would not refuse to obey the judgment by simply appealing to the military authority. Notwithstanding this, however, the courts have continued to dispense justice and the officials are still performing the duties of their various offices, and the fact that this can be done and is being done and the judgments of the courts are being carried out is one of the greatest demonstrations that could possibly exist to show the unanimity of the people in their allegiance to the new government and their determination to obey the mandates and the decrees of heir own officials.

All kinds of cases are being tried and tried in secret. It must be remembered that the parties to the suit and their witnesses must all be told of the place where the trial is to take place. They are all so loyal to Ireland that they maintain the secret inviolate, and when they lose they abide by the decision and still keep secret from British authorities all that has transpired. In the entire history of civilization there can not be found an instance where the people of all classes, high and low, have with such unanimity refused to divulge to the authorities of the enemy of their country any evidence of any kind that would give any information valuable to the enemy and injurious to their own cause. The men constituting the British authorities, trying to overthrow the Irish government, are, of course, strangers in the community where they are operating, and in hunting for an individual whom they do not know they must depend, of course, upon information of people in the locality to enable them to identify the person sought. The Irishman "on the run" is safe from exposure in any Irish home or in any assembly of Irishmen. I am told that there are instances where British military officers have been hunting for Irishmen and have made inquiry in hotel lobbies where men living in the locality were present and where the person wanted was among the number; that the British official might be talking with the very man he was hunting for, in the presence of dozens of people who knew him, and still remain in utter ignorance of his whereabouts. The loyalty of the Irish people to the new government and the universal obedience that is given by all classes of people to the judgment of the Irish courts is well illustrated by an instance that happened in a criminal case tried before one of these Sinn Fein courts. The defendant was found guilty of some minor offense, and the judgment of the court was that he should be held in imprisonment for a stated time. It was impossible, of course, to put him in a public jail, so the sentence was carried out by taking him to a small, desolate island near the coast where the trial took place. The British military authorities in some way discovered what the facts were, and two or three soldiers were detailed to go over to this island in a boat and release the prisoner. They reached the island and found the prisoner, but he refused to be released and announced to them that he had been sentenced to imprisonment on this island for a certain length of time by the Irish courts and that he was going to obey the mandate of the court which he respected, and he declined the proffered assistance to set him free.

There is one exception to the rule that the Irish people refuse to go into the British courts. Under the laws enacted a great many years ago there is a statute that permits any person whose property has been destroyed to bring an action for its value against the Government.

In order that the people of Ireland may be able to demonstrate from official British records the wanton and illegal destruction of their property, Irish citizens whose property has been destroyed under the ruthless régime of British military power have been encouraged to bring actions under this statute in the English courts. A great many such actions have been brought. The principal object, as I have stated, in bringing such actions is to give official demonstration from British authority of the claims which are made against Great Britain as to her conduct in Ireland. They do not expect to recover on the judgments which they obtain, because one of the peculiarities of this statute is that when judgment is rendered it is paid by the levying of a tax upon the community where the destruction has taken place, so that in effect the owners of homes and business places that have been wrecked are, together with their more fortunate neighbors whose property escapes destruction, compelled to pay by taxation upon themselves the damages inflicted under British military authority. I have in my hand a copy of an official report made by one of these British judges. The report is directed to the Right Hon. Sir Hamar Greenwood, a member of the British Cabinet and the chief secretary for Ireland. In this report the judge says that in the county of Clare there were 356 claims for compensation, amounting in all to over £466,000. Please bear in mind that this is pounds, not dollars, and if we convert it into American money at the rate of exchange existing prior to the war we would have claims in this one county alone amounting to over $2,000,000. The judge's report shows that at this session of court he tried 141 cases. He rendered judgment against the Government in 139 of these cases. He found for the Government in one case and he continued one case for further hearing. The total amount allowed in the 139 cases was £187,046 19s. 3d. This judge condemns in severe terms the action of the military authority of his own country. He describes the looting of stores and the burning of towns, all similar to those that I have narrated but none of them the same. In speaking of the looting at Lahinch, he says:

> * * * The town of Lahinch was attacked by a large body of the armed forces of the Government. Rifle shots were fired, apparently at random in the streets, and a very large number of houses and shops were broken into, set on fire, and their contents looted or destroyed. The inhabitants, most of them in their night clothes—men, women, and children, invalids, old people over 80, and children in arms—were compelled at a moment's notice and at the peril of their lives to fly through back doors and windows to the sand hills in the neighborhood of the town, where they remained during the night, returning in the morning to find their homes completely destroyed.

Referring to the raid that was made on Ennistymon, the judge says:

> On the same night the town of Ennistymon was similarly invaded by the armed forces of the Government. Shots were fired in the streets. The town hall and a large number of houses and shops were broken into, set on fire, and, with their contents, destroyed. As in Lahinch, the inhabitants were compelled to fly for their lives. A young married man named Conole was seized in the street by a party of men under command of an officer. His wife, who was with him, pleaded on her knees with the officer for the life of her husband, but he was taken away a short distance, shot, and his charred remains were found next morning in his own house, which had been burnt. Another young man named Linnane was shot dead in the streets while attempting to extinguish the flames.

This report shows that prior to these cases referred to, in the trial of other cases in this county, awards have been rendered to nearly a quarter of a million pounds. The judge then makes this recommendation:

> * * * This constitutes, in my humble judgment, an impossible burden on the ratepayers of the county, many of them already hopelessly impoverished by the loss of their property and means of livelihood, and I would strongly recommend that in the cases in which it is clearly proved that the criminal injuries were committed by the armed forces of the Government the compensation should be paid out of the public treasury.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as another appendix to my remarks the entire report of Judge Bodkin, from whose official report I have just quoted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[The report referred to will be found as Appendix D at the end of the speech of Mr. NORRIS.]

A STATE OF WAR.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there can be no question but that a state of war exists now and has existed between Great Britain and Ireland ever since Great Britain undertook to overthrow by armed force the Irish government. It has been officially determined by the British courts that a state of war exists. In the case of John Allen, who had been sentenced to death by the military authorities because he was found in possession of a revolver and what was claimed to be some seditious literature, the court of the King's bench, consisting of the lord chief justice and four other justices, upon an application for habeas corpus presented to them in behalf of John Allen, held that—

It was impossible not to come to the conclusion that at the time of the lord lieutenant's proclamation a state of war actually existed and continued to exist at the time of the arrest of John Allen, and since then down to the present time.

This case was decided in February, 1921. To my mind, whether you take either horn of the dilemma, there can be no justification for the conduct of the British military authorities. No rule of law or humanity of either peace or war can justify the inhuman and barbarous treatment that has been inflicted upon the Irish people. If war exists, then those captured must under the rules of civilized warfare be held as prisoners of war. If war does not exist, then persons charged with crime, whatever may be its nature, and captured must be tried according to the laws that govern in the country where the alleged offense is committed. There can be no justification for what has happened and is happening in Ireland under any rule, law, or regulation existing anywhere in civilization.

HOSTAGES.

It has become the custom in Ireland for the British military authorities, when they go out on a raid, to take as captives with them in the military lorries in which they travel one or more well-recognized friends of the Irish republic, in order to make the military squad safe from attack by members of the Irish republican army. When it was announced to the world that in the name of the British Government such inhuman things were being done the horror of it was so appalling that civilized people could not believe it to be true. Like many of the other atrocities, the honest American citizen put them down as falsehoods. He could not believe that the great British nation, boasting of its civilization and its justice, could be guilty of such inhuman conduct. But the evidence continues to accumulate, and we are now able to prove from British official sources that the reports are true. I have copies of a large number of proclamations in which the practice is officially announced. Proclamations by British officers that hostages would be carried in military lorries have been made in the counties of Clare, Cork, Kerry, and Dublin. A news item appeared in the Dublin paper of February 5, 1921, stating that Col. Maurice Moore was, a few days before, taken as a hostage.

I read from a portion of that item, as follows:

Col. Maurice Moore described to-day his experience last Saturday and Sunday, when he was arrested by soldiers and driven around Dublin in a military lorry as a hostage against Irish attacks, and finally released without any charge being made against him.

Col. Moore is more than 70 years old, a brother of George Moore, the novelist, and head of a great landowning family. He has a splendid military record, having been commanding officer of the Connaught Rangers, and holds the decoration of C. B. (companion of the bath), conferred by the King for gallant services in the South African war. While he is sympathetic with Irish nationalist demands, he has taken no part in any rebellious movement. His only political activity is chairman of the commission of inquiry into the industrial resources of Ireland.

It was the design of the British authorities to give as much publicity as possible to the fact that they were carrying hostages. In this way it made them safe from attack, and while they went out to shoot and burn and destroy they protected themselves by carrying with them as captives well-known friends of the Irish cause. It has even occurred that such hostages have been killed by the British themselves while thus held in captivity. In one instance, referred to in the British Parliament, it was shown that two hostages who had been taken in a lorry were brought back dead. The officials in charge of the lorry announced that the hostages were shot in an attack by members of the Irish republican army, but the remarkable coincidence existed that no one else had been injured, and one is irresistibly led to the conclusion that while the hostages were kept in captivity they were murdered by their captors.

But to set the matter finally at rest and to show conclusively that the British Government is engaging in this inhuman method of warfare, I want to read a portion of a statement issued to the public press of the United States by the British ambassador at Washington. This statement was issued the day after the so-called commission on conditions in Ireland made its report, and was intended to be an answer to that report. From this statement I quote the following:

The practice recently adopted of carrying hostages has entirely fulfilled its purpose, namely, to minimize murderous attacks on Crown forces and to prevent loss of life. Captured documents show clearly its restraining effect. No woman has ever been carried as a hostage.

It thus appears that the great and powerful Government of Great Britain, in fighting against a subject people, has thus resorted to this barbarous method of warfare for the purpose of minimizing attacks made on its forces. In other words, its military forces go out to attack the enemy that is in rebellion, and in order to make themselves safe from danger while they are engaging in military operations they carry hostages in order to prevent the enemy from firing upon them—and they defend themselves before the civilized world by saying that they do not carry women as hostages. This argument is, in effect, that while they are barbarous they are not as bad as they might be. I presume from this argument that if the carrying of men as hostages did not make their soldiers safe from attack they would, of course, feel justified in taking women as hostages, and if that did not prevent the attack of the enemy it would follow, I presume, that each British soldier would take an Irish child strapped upon his back whenever he went into battle, in order to make him safe.

What a great satisfaction it ought to be to the women of Ireland in particular and the women of the civilized world in general to hear from the lips of the British ambassador in America that in the prosecution of the war against Ireland "no woman has ever been carried as a hostage." But I want to warn these women that this great English statesman has given no assurance that women will not be carried as hostages. Great Britain has not admitted that she has not the right to carry women as hostages. She has simply announced to the world that so far "no woman has been carried as a hostage." The women of Ireland are as patriotic as the men. They are making as many sacrifices as the men. They are suffering starvation and often death for the Irish cause; and as Miss MacSwiney, the sister of the late lord mayor of Cork, has stated from many an American rostrum, if the men of Ireland should surrender, the women of Ireland would still fight to the death; they would take up the cause even though they knew they could not win, and fight until the last life was sacrificed.

When the British military authorities send the soldiers out in lorries they claim that they are liable to be ambushed; that Ireland had no army in uniform bearing arms; that her army, while organized according to the British military tactics, is dressed in civilian clothes and scattered throughout the country; that by some means or secret communication, understood only by them they are able to assemble in squads at designated places and at an appointed hour without anyone having any notice of it. They claim, therefore, that they are not fighting an army, and that for this reason they are justified in the course they are pursuing.

Let us admit for the sake or argument that the Irish are murderers and assassins. What justification does that give for taking innocent people with them for the purpose of preserving the lives of the officials who go out to arrest the murderers and assassins? Suppose that in an American city the police were going out to capture a man against whom a charge of murder had been laid, and for fear that they might find the man armed and that he might resist arrest, they were to take some innocent person, preferably a friend of the man they were seeking, and put him in front when they approached the locality of the alleged murderer. Where is the civilized man, in America or elsewhere, who would condone such a practice? Where is civilization, in any jurisprudence, can be found any precedent for such a course? What right has any official to injure the life or endanger the safety of any person by thrusting him in front when an attack is made on some alleged criminal?

For sake of the argument we might be willing to admit that these Irish soldiers were barbarians—yes, we might admit that they were cannibals—and still the military practices of Great Britain in Ireland must be condemned by the civilized world.

But, Mr. President, the condition of the Irish army as to uniforms and arms can be traced and laid directly at the feet of Great Britain. At the beginning Ireland's army were dressed in uniform; they bore arms; they drilled in public; but one of the first things that Great Britain did was to decree by military order, without any law, without any statute having been passed to authorize it, that the bearing of arms on the part of any Irishman would be punished by death. Even to be dressed in the uniform of the Irish army meant death—not death after a trial before a jury, but death by the decree of military authority, the decree of the oppressors of Ireland. Under these decrees, Irish are being hanged and shot down by British military authority every day for the simple reason that they are found in the possession of a revolver or a gun or some ammunition, or in possession of some literature unfriendly to the British Empire and friendly to the Irish republic.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And yet, Mr. President, the highest court of England, the chief justice sitting, has decreed that a state of war exists.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; as I have already read.

So it appears that Ireland is driven to her method of warfare, not by choice but by compulsion, and that compulsion has come from the very power that now objects to the very thing that its own act has brought about—the very power that uses that condition to hang and shoot men for no other reason than that they have within their bosoms the spirit of liberty and of freedom.

It must be remembered also that the Irish army is not guilty of the British method of warfare. It is not charged even by the British Government that the Irish carry hostages, although they have had ample opportunity to do so, because they have captured a great many British soldiers. No British soldier has even been taken prisoner by the Irish and punished for the offenses for which the British authorities are inflicting the death sentence. Before the making of these military decrees on the part of the British the Irish army was in the open and wore a uniform. They captured in many instances the barracks where British soldiers were stationed, and their universal practice was to disarm all the prisoners they took and then give them their liberty. This despised nation, alleged by the British authorities to be murderers, were giving an example to their British tormentors of their civilization and upright honor and manhood. Until these decrees practically announced that whenever the British took prisoners they would be killed the Irish had not engaged even in ambushing any British military squads. They have never carried hostages. They have not killed their prisoners simply because they belonged to the other army, and are not doing so now.

The idea of the Irish was to obtain their independence by peaceful means. They had established a government that was functioning in all its details. They asked only to be let alone. They had no way after war actually commenced of getting arms except as they captured them from the British Army. Their army was supplied to quite an extent with ammunition that had been taken from the British soldiers. It was only when, by these merciless decrees of British military authorities, all the rules of war, peace, and humanity were set aside, and it appeared that the Irish were going to be killed, and their homes and property destroyed, simply because they were unwilling to live under British rule, that the Irish were driven to conceal their arms, to drill their soldiers in secret, to dispense with a uniform, and to pursue a method of warfare that was made absolutely necessary by the action of the British military authorities. The hanging and shooting of Irish prisoners by the British military authorities is going on daily. Almost every day the newspapers carry accounts of the fact that Irishmen have been executed by the British because of attacks made on British soldiers, or because they have been found in possession of firearms or literature friendly to the Irish cause.

I read from the Associated Press dispatch contained in the papers of February 28, 1921:

CORK, February 28.

Despite the appeal for clemency made recently by the Cork corporation, the six Irishmen in jail here, whose death was fixed for to-day on charges of levying war against the Crown forces, were duly executed by the military this morning. The men were shot in batches of two each at intervals of 15 minutes.

Then follow the names of the six men executed, and the dispatch continues:

* * * The men executed were condemned for an attack upon the Crown forces at Dripsey, County Cork, in January. Allen, whose home was in Tipperary, was sentenced for possessing a revolver and ammunition.

And thus the massacre goes merrily on, and as it increases in barbarity and wretchedness the spirit for Irish freedom grows stronger and greater in the hearts of those who survive.

[At this point Mr. NORRIS yielded the floor for the day.]

Tuesday, June 21, 1921.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned on yesterday I had reached the point in my address where I desired to take up the subject of reprisals.

REPRISALS.

The story of the reprisals of the British military authorities against the Irish people would fill a volume. There is no dispute whatever that the policy of reprisals was regularly and deliberately inaugurated by the British authorities and is still kept up and carried on. Sometimes the reprisals are carried out against individuals and sometimes against whole communities. I have never been able to find a single instance where any investigation was made in advance of these reprisals in order to ascertain whether there was in fact any connection between the owners of the property destroyed and the persons who were guilty of the alleged crime.

Like the taking of hostages, the British officials seem to have given as much publicity as they could to the fact that the Government which they represent had embarked upon a reprisal policy in order, as they claimed, to prevent attacks on the armed forces of Great Britain. On January 22, 1921, an order was issued by the brigade major at Cork openly announcing a policy of reprisals without parallel in modern or ancient history. The announcement of this officer, given publicity by him, that a policy of reprisals had been carried out in the case noted, reads as follows:

As a result of the ambush and attack on the police at Midelton and the Glebe House it was decided by the military governor that certain houses in the vicinity of the outrages were to be destroyed, as the inhabitants were bound to have known of the ambush and attack, and that they neglected to give any information either to the military or police authorities. The following houses were duly destroyed between 3 p. m. and 6 p. m. on January 1.

Then follow the names of the owners of seven homes which had been destroyed, and the announcement continues:

Previous to the burnings notice B was served on the persons affected, giving them one hour to clear out valuables, but not furniture. No foodstuffs, corn, or hay were destroyed.

This notice is similar to all others where individual homes were destroyed. It will be observed that it is not even claimed that any investigation was made.

The people who are to be deprived of their homes and all their earthly possessions are not even given an opportunity to be heard in their own defense. They are conclusively presumed, without any investigation, to have had prior knowledge of the alleged attack and to have neglected to give notice thereof to the proper authority. It is not even claimed that these people participated in the attack complained of. It is simply assumed that because they lived in the vicinity of the place of the attack they must be driven from their homes and their earthly possessions destroyed. This particular case was called to the attention of Sir Hamar Greenwood in the House of Commons shortly after it occurred, and Sir Greenwood, representing the Crown, not only admitted that it had occurred but that it had his full approval. But if additional evidence were needed to show that Great Britain has been and is engaged upon a course of reprisal against the Irish people, it can be furnished from the testimony of the British ambassador in Washington. In the statement from which I quoted earlier in my speech he makes a definite admission that British authorities are guilty of reprisals and that it is the policy of the British Government in Ireland. I quote from the same statement referred to before, as follows:

The military authorities have destroyed, as a legitimate penalty, the property of persons who are known to have been able to prevent serious outrages but did not do so.

Of course, the ambassador has in this statement modified the policy just a little. The facts are that in no case that I have discovered has the British Government taken any pains to make an inquiry even to ascertain whether the persons whose property they were about to destroy knew or could have known of the contemplated attack. All the evidence goes to indicate that parties in the vicinity would not under any circumstances have been able to know of the contemplated attack. If these attacks were secretly planned, as they surely were, and as it is conceded they were planned, the authorities who arranged them would certainly know that publicity of their plans would have brought certain failure, and they would have given no information of the attack or the place thereof to any person to whom such notice was not absolutely necessary in carrying it out.

On February 2, 1921, a similar reprisal took place in Glengoole district, near Killenaule, and on that occasion the following official typewritten notice, dated February 2, was served on the owners of the property to be destroyed:

Whereas attacks by rebels were made on the forces of the Crown 1 mile north of New Birmingham on January 24; and whereas it is considered that you were bound to have known of the same, and that you neglected to give information to the police or military authorities, now, therefore, I, Col. Commandant N. J. G. Cameron, C. B., C. M. G., A. D. C., commanding Sixteenth Infantry Brigade, and military governor, have ordered the destruction of your house. From the time of receipt of this notice you have one hour's notice to remove from your house any valuables, foodstuffs, hay, or corn, but not furniture.

How any nation can lay claim to respectable standing in civilization and be guilty of such unholy and unmerciful conduct is more than I can understand. If some weak nation like poor unoffending, downtrodden China should be guilty of such conduct against any people on earth, the whole world would rise up in condemnation. Must we condone it because the guilty one is great and powerful? Must we forgive crime when perpetrated in the name of Great Britain for fear of giving offense to a nation upon whose territory the sun never sets and whose armed naval vessels ride upon every sea? Has justice disappeared since our Great War for humanity and the sword been enthroned in its place? Let every American mother, when she tucks her little babe safely in bed, remember that the greatest nation in the world has driven thousands of mothers just like her out of their homes with their crying babes in their arms and then destroyed every vestige of the fireside that has been the work and the toil and the sacrifices of years.

Sometimes the British authorities were more merciful and did not destroy the homes, but satisfied their avarice by the destruction of their contents. I have a copy of a sworn affidavit made by Miss Madge O'Daly, whose home is in Limerick. She is a woman of ample means and until the 9th day of April, 1921, she lived in a beautiful and expensively furnished home in the suburbs of Limerick. In Miss O'Daly's family there were no men, but she lived with her mother, who was quite old and in delicate health, her mother's sister, 83 years of age, and Miss O'Daly's two sisters. Her brother and her sister's husband, who had formerly lived in the house with her, had both been executed by the English more than a year before this date. Prior to this particular attack, and a long time after the execution of her brother and her brother-in-law, her house has been raided several times. In one week during the month of August, 1920, her home was raided five different times, each time in the dead of night. The rugs were torn up and in some instances the floors were even torn up, and their furniture, bedding, books, letters, clothing, and everything searched and minutely examined by the soldiers. Often the inmates of the house were abused by the soldiers, and on one occasion most of the soldiers participating in the raid were so drunk they could hardly stand. One night in October, 1920, another raid was made on this home of these defenseless women at about midnight. On this occasion both of the sisters of Miss O'Daly were maltreated by the soldiers. They were both frightened by putting revolvers into their faces. One of the sisters was knocked down and dragged out of the house by her hair, and after she had been dragged out of the house they cut off her hair, and in the struggle against this attack her hand was severely cut, an artery being severed, so that her life was endangered for some time.

I might say that the cutting off of women's hair is not an exception; there are many cases where similar assaults have been made upon women. On the 9th day of April, 1921, another attack was made by the soldiers. The ordinary notice, similar to those I have already read, was served on the occupants of the house, and in that notice they were informed that an ambush had taken place the day before in that vicinity, and that the owner of this house had not given any notice to the British authorities, and that they were, therefore, to have their furniture destroyed. This was given as the excuse for what happened. It was another case of reprisal, and in this case Miss O'Daly makes affidavit that at the time the alleged ambush took place she was not at home, and could not as a matter of fact have known anything in regard to it. She was not only not at her home at the time, but had been out of the city for several days. The house where she lived was more than a mile from the place where it is alleged the ambush took place. Usually the notice served upon the owners of homes to be burned gave them an hour's notice to vacate. In this case they were given but 15 minutes, and even before the 15 minutes had expired they were forced out of the house, and for two and a half hours they stood there and watched their home being wrecked. The soldiers broke all the windows, destroyed the gas fittings, and carried all the furniture and every particle of clothing out into the middle of the road and set fire to it. When they were driven out of the house one of the ladies undertook to carry with her a sealskin coat, but a British officer saw it, took it away from her, and fed it to the consuming flames. The soldiers destroyed all their books, all their letters, and even their jewelry and other family heirlooms that were precious, not for their intrinsic value but for the memories that surrounded them. They performed all kinds of antics. One of the soldiers took a corset, put it on, and danced around the house. Another took a silk hat that had belonged to the dead brother, put it on, and danced about the premises before he threw it into the flames. While the house itself was not burned, there was not a vestige of any kind of furniture or fixtures left in it. There was not a window or a glass anywhere in the house that was not broken, and these women, two of them very old and one an invalid, were left standing around the ashes of all the personal property they possessed. A servant in the house who made some effort to interfere with the soldiers was beaten and kicked until she was completely disabled, and was under the doctor's care for some time afterwards. Incidents like this could be repeated almost without end; repeated, in fact, until the hearer would become calloused to the repeated narrations of depredations that would disgrace a barbarian.

But these reprisals did not stop with individuals. They sometimes included whole communities, whole villages. On the 27th day of September, 1920, the town of Mallow was sacked and a good portion of it burned. At 10 o'clock in the morning of that day an attack was made on the British barracks by the republican forces. All the incidents surrounding the attack go to show that it was not the intention of the Irish forces to kill any of the soldiers in the barracks. Their object was to obtain arms and ammunition. They made a surprise attack and in the fight which followed one soldier was killed. As a reprisal for this the town of Mallow was attacked by soldiers coming from two other villages in military lorries. The attack took place at 10.30 o'clock at night. The troops were equipped with incendiary bombs and gasoline sprays, and they sacked and burned the town, destroying most of the houses and public buildings and a condensed-milk factory located about a mile from the city, which gave employment to quite a large number of the inhabitants of Mallow. When the volunteer fire department of the town attempted to put out the fire British soldiers fired shots at them and drove them away. The people were terrified and were driven from their homes. Many of them fled to the cemetery. There was a certain woman in the town who had given birth to a child but a few days before. She dragged herself and carried her babe with her into the cemetery. She remained in the graveyard all night watching the destruction of her home and the homes of her neighbors, suffering untold agonies. As a result of the exposure she died a few days later and was buried in the cemetery where this night of horror and hell was passed. She was, however, not the only person who perished on account of exposure through the long hours of this night. It happens in this case that the condensed-milk factory was owned by Englishmen whose homes were in England. Whether the military authorities knew this or not I can not say, but even if they did know it it is probable that it would have been destroyed for the simple purpose of putting out of employment the Irishmen who earned their livelihoods on account of its existence.

The burning of the town of Lisburn illustrates the desperate and heartless character of the men who controlled the British military authorities in Ireland. While I am not able to say that the burning of Lisburn was done directly by the soldiers themselves, it was a direct and logical result of the reign of terror that was inaugurated and carried on throughout Ireland.

In order to understand the reason for this reprisal it is necessary for me to briefly refer to the murder of Lord Mayor MacCurtain in the city of Cork. Lord Mayor MacCurtain, it should be remembered, was almost idolized by the Irish people. He left a wife and five children, the oldest child being 10 years of age. His house was raided many times before he was killed. On one occasion it was raided just a few days after he had buried one of his children and but three days before Mrs. MacCurtain's confinement in the birth of another child. After the death of the lord mayor the home still occupied by his widow was raided 15 or 20 times by the Imperial British forces. It was on the 20th day of March, 1920, that the lord mayor was murdered. At this time no military order had been issued preventing the holding of inquests. An inquest was held over the dead body of Lord Mayor MacCurtain under laws that had existed for many years. It was held by the duly elected and qualified officials. It was held in public and a large amount of testimony was taken. Everybody knew of it, and, because the murdered man was the lord mayor of Cork, it, of course, attracted a great deal of attention. It was attended by a large number of people. The military authorities of Great Britain knew of it and were invited to be present and give any testimony they might have or that might be required.

This, however, they refused to do. After the evidence was all in, the jury, having been duly impaneled and sworn, agreed upon a verdict, and in this verdict they named several British military officials as the parties guilty of the murder of the lord mayor. It should be remembered that Lord Mayor MacCurtain was murdered in his own home in the presence of his family. Among the British officers named by the verdict of the jury as being guilty of this murder was a man by the name of Swanzy, a British inspector of police. It was, of course, impossible for the authorities of Cork to arrest Swanzy or any of the other military officials. It was therefore an impossibility to try them under the law for murder. They were protected by the British military authorities. Of course, the citizens of the great city of Cork were very much aroused. The feeling was terribly intense, and when it became known that the British authorities were going to take no action, and that it would be, therefore, impossible to try those guilty of the murder of the lord mayor, several of the parties named by the coroner's jury as guilty of the crime were killed and the British authorities were unable to discover any clue as to the identity of those who had killed the soldiers charged with this murder. It was feared that Swanzy might be thus assassinated, and to prevent it the British authorities transferred him from Cork, in the south of Ireland, to Lisburn, in the north of Ireland. Lisburn is a town near Belfast. It is inhabited, or was inhabited, mostly by poor people who earned a livelihood in the various factories in that vicinity.

UMI

Some time after Swanzy had been transferred to Lisburn, one Sunday morning in September, 1920, as he came out of church he was shot dead by unknown persons who had driven up in front of the church in three automobiles. The murder of Swanzy took place in the presence of practically the entire congregation as they were emerging from the church, but no one was able to identify any of the men who did the shooting. There was no question but what they were strangers in the town, and as far as I know the British officials have never been able to get any clue as to their identity. It was generally supposed, and I think it is true, that the men who killed Swanzy were members of the Irish republican army, and that they had come up from southern Ireland for this purpose.

As a reprisal for this the town of Lisburn was burned. The fire was started from a large number of places in the town, and burned all night and part of the next day. Although the fire lit up the heavens for miles, and although it was only a very short distance from Belfast, no attempt was made to extinguish the flames.

The fire was allowed to burn itself out. The women and children of Lisburn were driven out of their homes and fled to the hills, many of them not fully dressed, a great many barefooted. Some of the women carried babies in their arms. They trudged over the country and over the stony roads until their pathway was marked with the blood of their torn and lacerated feet. Many of them wandered into the town of Belfast the next morning, some of them almost unable to travel. Most of them had lost everything that they possessed on earth—their homes, that represented the years of toil and sacrifice, all the clothing except that which they wore—in fact, all that they had in the world they saw go up in flames as they were wearily trudging their way over the hills.

They were, of course, objects of charity. Families were divided and distributed among people who would care for them and give them succor. The charitably inclined people of Belfast rented a vacant hall in the town, filled it with beds, and in this room many women with their little broods were housed and fed and cared for. A woman perhaps with from three to five children had an improvised bed, with only a few feet surrounding it, where she and her children had to sleep and live.

The condition of these people was described by Mrs. Robinson, an Englishwoman, and a member of the orthodox Church of England, and who was one of the committee of ten that was sent by the English branch of the International League of Women into Ireland to study conditions. She was there just a few days after the fire, and she declares that the condition of these women and children was perfectly beyond human description and almost beyond the imagination. In this hall, filled with several hundred women and children, where they had to eat and sleep and live, there was no place for the children to play, no place for mothers to go; they occupied a bed at night and sat on the edge of the bed during the day. There were no chairs, there were no toilet facilities, and the suffering and agony was simply indescribable.

It is unnecessary to defend the murder of Swanzy in order to defend the atrocities that followed. No one has ever charged that the people who suffered were in any way responsible for Swanzy's death. It is admitted that these people were entirely innocent of any plot to murder Swanzy. Very few of them knew him, and I presume of those who did there were very few who knew anything about his history. The inflicting of suffering upon innocent women and children and the destruction of the homes of hundreds of the poor, driving them out into the streets homeless and almost naked, all these things were brought about entirely and solely because of the indefensible program of the British authorities to break the will of the Irish people and to quench in the hearts of the citizens of Ireland the flame for freedom and for liberty; but it should be said, I think, that the killing of Swanzy was likewise the natural and logical result of this same policy. It is true that his guilt had not been determined by any tribunal that had jurisdiction to try him for the crime with which he was charged by the verdict of the jury at the coroner's inquest. He was entitled to a trial; but the Irish people, while anxious to give him such a trial, were deprived of that right by the military power of Britain; and when a Government denies to a subject people the right to try men charged with crime it is natural, it is human nature, that these people will take the law into their own hands.

If a case similar to that of the murder of Lord Mayor MacCurtain had occurred in America in 1776, and this same British Government had protected the man who was charged with the murder, and taken him to another part of the country, he would have been murdered by our forefathers just as the Irish people murdered Swanzy, and had such a thing occurred in our Revolutionary days the story of the murder would be read in American history by every school child and would have been defended by every American citizen.

It is useless to go on and give incidents of these horrible atrocities. I have undertaken to give only a few which illustrate the general rule of raids, of hostages, of reprisals, of cruelty, and of inhuman treatment. I think I might refer briefly to one military order, the cruelty and inhumanity of which is so outrageous that it ought to be considered.

One of the military proclamations that has been issued by the British military authorities in Ireland reads, in part, as follows:

(d) That a state of armed insurrection exists; that any person taking part therein or harboring any person who has taken part therein, or procuring, inviting, aiding, or abetting any person to take part therein, is guilty of levying war against His Majesty the King, and is liable on conviction by a military court to suffer death.

It must be remembered that a large part of Ireland is practically unanimous in favor of Irish independence. This order would not only punish those who actually engaged in insurrection but it would punish the wife if she did not report to British authority in case her husband was a member of the Irish republican army. He could not remain all night in his own home without making his own wife liable to the punishment of death if she did not report him. It would deprive the mother of permitting her own son to sleep in her home. It is, in effect, a death warrant that applied in some portions of Ireland to all its inhabitants. The fact that it was not universally enforced is not the fault of the British Government. The facts are that the people of Ireland were so loyal that although orders like this made them traitors, they still refused to divulge any information or give evidence as to the whereabouts of any republican.

The world was terribly shocked a few years ago when Edith Cavell, a well-known English woman, was tried, condemned, and shot by a German military tribunal in Belgium because she had violated an order made by Germany that was to all intents and purposes exactly the same as this one. A civilized world condemned the German Government. All over Christendom no voice could be heard in defense of the action of the German military authorities, and Edith Cavell's death was mourned throughout the civilized world. If we are to defend Great Britain in the proclamation of this order, then if we are fair we ought to apologize to the German authorities whom we condemned for the death of Edith Cavell. If this order is just, then the killing of Edith Cavell was right; and if the murder of Edith Cavell under a similar order made by Germany was murder, and I believe it was, then the making of a similar order by the British Government ought to place her in the same category with Germany.

In this connection, and as bearing directly on this proposition, I want to read a portion of an editorial that appeared in the London Nation of January 15, 1921. The editorial is headed "The Belgian Parallel," and reads, in part, as follows:

A document that moved the whole world was published five years ago by a commission appointed by Mr. Asquith's Government to report on the German atrocities in Belgium. * * * These were the early days of the war, and the indictment of Germany revealed to a horrified world what militarism really means, and the reckless thoroughness with which it sacrifices every human right to military success. It was widely read in all countries; in England with burning indignation. But, like all such literature, it was soon pushed out of most people's minds by the events of the war. Those who read it now will be startled to find how exact is the parallel between Germany's reasoning in Belgium and ours in Ireland.

The editorial then quotes a portion of this report, as follows:

An invading army may be entitled to shoot at sight a civilian caught red-handed, or anyone who, though not caught red-handed, is proved guilty on inquiry. But this was not the practice followed by the German troops. They do not seem to have made any inquiry. They seized the civilians of the village indiscriminately and killed them, or such as they selected from among them, without the least regard to guilt or innocence.

Then the article proceeds to compare the condition in Ireland with that in Belgium according to the Bryce report, using this language:

In how many towns and villages of Ireland have men or boys been shot out of hand on this same principle? The three men murdered at Cork last October, to take an example, were chosen not because they had been associated with any crime but because they were representative Sein Feiners. The commissioners, after turning over various explanations of the conduct of the German troops, hit upon a sentence which exactly describes the policy defended and expounded by Sir Hamar Greenwood in his speeches to the House of Commons and in the columns of his paper, the Weekly Summary.

The editorial then quotes again from the Bryce report on conditions in Belgium:

The explanation seems to be that these excesses were committed—in some cases ordered, in others allowed—on a system and in pursuance of a set purpose. That purpose was to strike terror into the civil population and dishearten the Belgian troops, so as to crush down resistance and extinguish the very spirit of self-defense.

In the minds of Prussian officers war seems to have become a sort of sacred mission, one of the highest functions of the omnipotent State, which is itself as much an army as a State. Ordinary morality and the ordinary sentiment of pity vanish in its presence, superseded by a new standard which justifies to the soldier every means that can conduce to success, however shocking to a natural sense of justice and humanity, however revolting to his own feelings.

And then the editorial in the London Nation proceeds further to compare conditions in Ireland to those described by Mr. Bryce in Belgium:

What better description could be written of the shooting of Mr. Gwynn, or the girl killed in the Dublin streets, or of the speeches in which Hamar Greenwood told the House of Commons that the right way to pacify Ireland was not to control the armed servants of the Crown, but to leave the Black and Tans to use their own methods?

In detail, almost everything that is done in Ireland was blamed by the commission in reporting on Belgium. The commissioners report, for example, that a woman was shot by some German soldiers as she was walking home, and for no apparent reason. Doubtless the Reichstag would have been told, as the House of Commons was told by Sir Hamar Greenwood, that the soldiers were in the habit of shooting as they moved about in case there might be an ambush in the neighborhood. * * * In the case of incendiarism the parallel is remarkably close. In Ireland houses have been burned in towns and villages by the hundreds on the excuse that somebody has been shot in the neighborhood. Turn now to Belgium:

"At Morlanwitz * * * the Germans burned the Hotel de Ville and 62 houses. The usual accusation of firing by civilians was made."

Later on in the editorial the writer proceeds, as follows:

For in our war on the Irish people, which is the consequence of racial pride, we are copying the spirit which Lord Bryce and his colleagues described as the spirit of Prussia. We represent that spirit in Ireland, and nothing else.

Then the writer of the editorial quotes the conclusion of the Bryce report:

We venture to hope that as soon as the present war is over the nations of the world in council will consider what means can be provided and sanctions devised to prevent the recurrence of such horrors as our generation is now witnessing.

The editorial, in concluding, comments thereon, as follows:

Those are the concluding words of the Bryce report. None of the signatories—Mr. Fisher least of all—can have imagined that when the war was over the world would witness such a "recurrence" and that its author would be their own land and Empire.

The editorial needs no comment from me. It is the word picture of a deadly parallel between German atrocities in Belgium and British atrocities in Ireland. It ought to bring from the British Government either a promise to the Irish people that they would in the future be treated with some humanity, or, if England refuses to do that, it ought to bring from that great Government an apology to the Kaiser. It ought to acknowledge that the laws of humanity that were disregarded in Belgium, and about which the British Government complained, have no application when the British Government is the aggressor and the Irish people are the sufferers. It ought to bring an acknowledgment to the world from the British Government that the murder by the Germans of Edith Cavell was justified according to British rule in Ireland.

BRITISH OBJECTIONS TO IRISH FREEDOM.

It has become apparent to all men and women who have studied the Irish situation that the Irish will never submit willingly to English rule. The history of centuries has demonstrated that while Ireland may be exterminated she will never consent to be governed by a foreign power. This should be as apparent to Englishmen as to anyone else, but it is said, and said by many honest men both in England and elsewhere, that England can not agree to Irish independence because her own safety as a nation would thereby become endangered.

IRELAND'S PROXIMITY TO ENGLAND.

It is claimed that one reason why England can not agree to Irish independence is that Ireland is so close to England that she might become the rendezvous for England's enemies, and that after getting a foothold in Ireland the enemy could use that country as a base for an attack upon England. If Ireland were independent, she could at least offer no greater inducement for the landing of England's enemies than is offered at the present time under English control. England has not fortified the coast of Ireland against outside attack. She relies upon her navy for defense, and if Ireland were independent conditions then would at least be no worse than they are now. On the other hand, if Ireland were independent and built fortifications on her own coast these fortifications would be an added security to England, because Ireland is ready to enter into any kind of an agreement that will guarantee her neutrality, and being neutral she, of course, would do everything possible to repel invasion of her territory.

Aside from this, there is absolutely no logic or reason in the argument that the safety of England would be jeopardized to have an independent nation like Ireland as close to her as Ireland is. Ireland is not as close to England as France. She is not as close to England as Belgium. Her principal ports from which an enemy could attack England are farther from England than is Holland, and nearly as far as Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. If England must hold Ireland because Ireland is so close to her, then for the same reason England must take France and hold that country in subjection. She must take Belgium, and if we carry the argument still further, she must take the United States, because the United States lies closer to a British possession than Ireland does, and if England must be protected by owning everything that is close to her, why should not the same argument apply to every other nation? If we apply this reasoning to our own country, then the United States should take Canada, on the one hand, and Mexico on the other, and after we have acquired Mexico we should for the same reason take Central America, and continue on until we have captured everything down to Cape Horn, at the southern extremity of South America. And England, after she has taken France, would be compelled for the same reason to take Spain, Germany, and so forth, until in the end England would have all Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, so that the argument, followed to its natural conclusion, means that England must have under her flag the entire world.

THE ENGLISH CLAIM THAT THE RELEASE OF IRELAND WOULD ENDANGER THE EXISTENCE OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

The English opponents of Irish freedom, while in many cases admitting that Ireland should have the right to govern herself and be independent, yet claim that Ireland's domination by Great Britain is necessary in order to preserve the Empire. While most strenuously denying this proposition, yet for the purpose of the argument let us for the moment admit it, and what is the conclusion that we must draw? Must one nation become the unwilling subject of another nation simply because the people of that other nation believe that such subjection is necessary for their own preservation? Are the rights, privileges, and liberties of Englishmen superior to the rights of other peoples? In order to preserve English liberty must Ireland be the unwilling subject of England? Has civilization the right before God and before the world to decree the subjugation of one people in order that another people may be free? Has our civilization sunk so low that one individual shall have the right to enslave another, simply to prevent his own enslavement by some other person? Is the spirit of liberty in the heart of an Irishman inferior to the same spirit that breathes in the breast of an Englishman? Is the world so degraded that Ireland must be enslaved in order to make England free? By what right of God or man has one nation the privilege to rule another unwilling nation in order to increase its own power? In this day of an enlightened world, is freedom such a precarious and uncertain thing that to retain it we must enslave some one else? Is it not possible that all peoples can be free and all men enjoy freedom? Is self-determination and the preservation of the rights of the weak for which the World War was fought nothing but a myth? This proposition is founded upon a most barbarous theory. If carried from nations to individuals it must follow that one man has a right to the services of another without his consent. It is an approval in principle of the doctrine of human slavery. All history disproves it, and our own country is a living example. Our forefathers became rebels to the British Crown in order that our country might be free. They tore from the British Empire her most valuable possession, and England has lived for more than a century more prosperous, more happy, more independent, and more powerful than though she had won the Revolutionary War. The holding of unwilling peoples under the control of a dominating nation is always a source of weakness, and sometime, somewhere, under God's rule of justice, the weakness will be shown and the dominating power overthrown. The right of a nation to be free involves the same principle of justice as does the right of an individual to be free. No one, not even in Ireland, wants to dismember the British Empire. We have a portion of the British Empire adjoining us for nearly 4,000 miles, inhabited by a people that differ no more from us than the people of New Jersey differ from the people of Nebraska. Our aspirations are the same. We are separated only by an imaginary line along which there is no threatening gun or cannon. As long as Canada is satisfied to remain in the British Empire there is a unanimity among American citizens that she should so remain.

But if Canada were striving for her independence, if she desired to throw off her allegiance to the mother country, the American people, while remaining neutral, would almost unanimously sympathize with her aspirations, not because they have any hatred or ill will against England but because of the indescribable but certain sentiment that exists in every civilized heart that every people and every nation have the right to govern themselves according to their own will.

IT IS CLAIMED THAT GREAT BRITAIN CAN GOVERN IRELAND BETTER THAN IRELAND CAN GOVERN HERSELF.

This is another proposition that I unqualifiedly deny, but even if it be true, it constitutes no defense to England's control of Ireland. It is not a question of good government so much as it is a question of self-government. I will concede that before Ireland is entitled to her freedom it must appear that she is able to govern herself, but it is not necessary that she should prove herself able to govern herself better than England could govern her. As far as I know, it is not claimed anywhere in the world that the Irish people are not competent for self-government, and, being thus competent, they should not be denied the right to govern themselves because some other nation claims they could do a better job of governing them. I presume it is true that the average Englishman prefers his Government to ours and honestly believes that it is a better form of government, but if by some upheaval of earthly powers England should again get control of America, would we pay any attention to that argument, even though we felt that the Englishman was honest in his belief, and even though we thought that England would give us a better government than we had when we governed ourselves? There are perhaps some American citizens—I think I know a few—who are honest in their belief that the British Government is better than ours, but has anybody offered that as an argument why we should ask for readmission into the British Empire, and if England or some other power should by some unfortunate occurrence get possession of our Government, would we listen to that kind of an argument? So long as there was a man alive, so long as there was a gun to be had, America would be fighting for her independence and her freedom, and we would never argue the question as to whether the conquering power would give us a better government than we were ourselves able to inaugurate. Under such conditions we would teach to our children when they first commenced to lisp the words of our language a hatred against the dominating power. This hatred would grow and be implanted in the hearts of children yet unborn, and it could only be subdued by the death of all the American people.

There is but little doubt, however, that Ireland would be able to govern herself much better than she has been governed by England. During her struggle for independence through the centuries that have passed she has been used for the enrichment and the glory and the power of the British Empire. Her people have been bowed almost to the earth in poverty. Surrounded by the most remarkable harbors in the world, her commerce is nullified and destroyed. She must pay tribute to the commercial glory and prosperity of her conqueror. With a soil as fertile as any on earth, capable of supporting four times the population she now has, she has been despoiled and has seen a large portion of the reward of her toil and her labor taken away from her people and given to England. Her population during her struggle for freedom has been reduced by one-half. Notwithstanding this subjection her people are recognized all over the world as shrewd, able, patriotic, brave, and courageous. Her soldiers, her scholars, her writers, her economists, and her poets are second to none in all Christendom. In spite of the destruction of her commerce and her wealth, and even of her population, her people have developed in intelligence, in wisdom, and in ability second to no other people in the world. In all civilization there can not be found a nation that has retained its identity pure and unsullied, through centuries of struggle and toil, to as great an extent as has Ireland.

With these qualities of self-government, the question of the kind of government should be left to the Irish people themselves, and it is sufficient to know that possessing these qualities the Irish people have been struggling for their independence for more than seven centuries. If England would to-day acknowledge the independence of Ireland without further struggle, she would give an example of justice to the world without parallel in history. Such an act on her part would command the universal respect and commendation of all the world. It would be a milestone in the progress of civilization that would be pointed to with pride and satisfaction by every writer of history and every student of history as long as the world is inhabited by man. It would be a precedent of a great nation marking the greatest step in human progress in history, and it would bring to England the commendation, the respect, and the approbation of millions of liberty-loving people still unborn. It would establish her on a pedestal among the nations of the earth and give her a power and a prestige in the diplomacy of the world such as no other human act could bring about.

In addition to this, it would bring her the respect and the love of the Irish people. Her wrongs and sins of the past, however great, would be at once forgotten, and Ireland would become immediately the friend of England, a neutral nation standing out in the ocean beyond her borders, stopping the progress of any evil-disposed power that any time in the future might undertake to attack the British Empire. But if England refuses to grant this independence, if she still persists in her cruelty and her inhuman treatment, she increases the bitterness, if that be possible, that now exists between the two nations; she makes every Irishman individually her enemy, and she makes an enemy collectively of the Irish people. If she continues to refuse this honest and just request, every Irish child born in the future will be taught at its mother's knee to hate England. This hatred will grow and continue to increase. It will live as long as an Irishman survives, and it ought to be apparent to England now and it should be apparent to the world that this condition must grow worse and can not be changed for the better.

No act of man can change the human heart; no statute of Great Britain, however liberal, can ever make the slave satisfied who is intelligent enough and has the desire to be free, and in the end the freedom of Ireland will be brought about even though England fights it at every step. It will come about because under the rule of a just God there can be no other conclusion. It may take time; it may bring untold and unlimited suffering; it may cause the soil of Ireland to run red with human blood, but sometime, in some way, the freedom of Ireland will prevail; it must prevail because it is just, because it is right, and because the spirit of human freedom never dies. There is only one way that Ireland can always be held in subjection, and that is by the extermination of the Irish race.

England ought to realize that she is facing the proposition that she can never hold Ireland in willing subjection. The history of the past centuries has demonstrated that, and if she continues in her present course and in order to hold her sway and her control and exercises her great military strength and ability at the expense of her unwilling subjects in Ireland, she will all the time demonstrate to the world her injustice, and as she proceeds further in the extermination of the Irish race the public sentiment of civilization will face her at every turn, and after all public sentiment when once aroused, once recognized, is the most powerful force among nations and among peoples that exists in the universe. Before its onward march the crowns of monarchs will fall from the heads of unholy rulers, the arms of autocracy and subjection will be crumbled and swept away, and the scepters of such power will vanish from the earth as the morning dew fades before the rising sun.

Ireland free will be England's friend; Ireland in subjection will be England's enemy. It will require an army of Englishmen to hold Ireland in subjection, and this must go on all the time, and when the days of trouble come, if in the future England gets into difficulty with any other nation and is so unfortunate as to get into war, it will be perfectly natural and logical for the Irish people to embrace the day of Great Britain's trouble and make another struggle for Irish freedom. The future safety of the British Empire depends upon England doing justice to Ireland. Injustice and suppression, however well backed up by power and against a people however weak, will always bring ruin in the end. It may at the time be beyond the view of mortal man, but under the decres of God and according to His laws there will come a time when the unjust ruler will be overthrown, when justice will be established, and when freedom will prevail.

THE RELIGIOUS QUESTION.

A propaganda has been spread over the world, and particularly over the United States, that, after all, the contest in Ireland is simply a question of religion. This propaganda has been industriously circulated throughout the United States with the particular view and object of influencing ministers of the Protestant churches. It is claimed that wherever the Catholics in Ireland are in control the Protestants are boycotted and persecuted, and that it is the aim of these Catholics to set up an independent government where they will be able to establish by law a Catholic religious autocracy, and that in the new government the Catholic religion will be established by law.

I am a Protestant. There flows in my veins not a single drop of blood but what is Protestant. All my family are Protestants. All my ancestors, so far as I know anything about them, were Protestants. I am not conscious of having any prejudices on the religious question, but if unconsciously I have any such prejudices I would be led to favor the Protestant government as against the Catholic government. I am opposed to any religion having control of any government. I am opposed to the establishment of any religion by law, but I would surrender my life before I would be a party to holding in unwilling subjection any people because of their religion. I deny that there is any religious question involved in the Irish situation. The fight there is a fight for freedom. It is joined in by people of all religions, and in those who oppose the Irish cause can be found the Roman Catholic as well as the Protestant.

The only reason why there are more Catholics struggling for Irish freedom than there are Protestants is because there are more Catholics in Ireland than Protestants, but in every struggle that has ever taken place and in the struggle that is going on now some of the greatest leaders in the movement, some of the most beloved by the Irish people, are pronounced and well-known Protestants. Some of the bitterest enemies that Ireland has in England to-day are Catholics. The names of the leaders of the fight for Irish independence now and during the years that are past are well known to the American people, but the American people do not know, in fact, these English propagandists have carefully concealed the fact that the most notable leaders for Irish freedom were and are Protestants. The names of Tone, of Fitzgerald, of McCracken, of Davis, of Butt, of Parnell stand out in the past history of this strife for freedom on the part of Ireland. Every one of them was Protestant. In the present struggle we hear of Arthur Griffith, Dr. Irwin, Countess Markowitch, Ernest Blythe, of the Irish Parliament; Capt. Robert Barton, and Mr. Erskine Childers; but we do not hear that Griffith is a Methodist; that Irwin is a Presbyterian minister, coming, by the way, from Ulster; that Countess Markowitch is a member of the established English Church; and that Blythe, Capt. Barton, and Mr. Childers are all Protestants.

Mrs. Frances Hackett, assistant editor of the New Republic, traveled with her husband several months ago through Ireland with a view to getting first-hand evidence of the situation. She went to Belfast, where Protestants are in the majority, and she has said that she was told by quite a number of manufacturers in Belfast that the religious question was a bogey man and that it had been deliberately aroused among the workers in the past to keep them divided. Some of these very manufacturers, she said, expressed amazement at the fruits of violence that the labors of these propagandists have brought forth by resorting to this unjust method of exciting prejudice against Ireland.

The committee representing the English branch of the Woman's International League say in their report, from which I have already quoted, that they were not able to find in Ireland the religious differences and prejudices that have been advertised to the world. They state in that report that they—> found an almost entire absence of ill feeling between members of the different denominations; that such members work harmoniously together on public bodies, cooperative societies, etc.; that they united in raising funds for the victimized families of Belfast, and gave no signs of the commercial rivalry or boycott that we had been warned to expect.

That is a quotation from the report of the committee, Protestants every one of them. They describe the bitterness in Ulster, which we have been led to believe as religious, as being political and not religious, and state that this sentiment has been inflamed from outside sources and that the withdrawal of such unwarranted propaganda would bring about harmony and cooperation even in Ulster. I have talked with two members of this committee of ten, and they both agree that there is no religious question involved. Mrs. Robinson, a member of this committee and a member also of the orthodox Church of England, as well as a native of that country, traveled through the northern part of Ireland. Miss Wilkinson is a member of the Methodist Church. She is an Englishwoman and her brother is a Methodist minister in England, and it might be incidentally remarked that another brother fought in the British Army in the recent war. When Miss Wilkinson started for Ireland she took with her a letter directed to the Methodist ministers in that country written by her minister brother, and in the towns which she visited she hunted up the Methodist ministers and presented this letter of introduction. She says that in all her travels, investigations, and conversations with the various Methodist ministers whom she met and with whom she was by this letter placed in a quasi-confidential relationship she never found a single instance where it was claimed that anywhere in the southern and western parts of Ireland, where Catholics predominated everywhere by a large majority, Protestants were ill treated by the Catholics. She was traveling constantly in portions of Ireland where, if there had been any such ill feeling, if there had been any such boycotting, she would have been able to locate it. I have talked with Dr. Irwin, a Presbyterian minister from Ulster, who came over to this country and made a speaking campaign of several weeks in behalf of Irish independence. He says that there is no religious question involved. He substantiates the testimony of Mrs. Hackett to the effect that this alleged religious controversy has been brought about for political and commercial purposes—and he lives and has spent his life in that portion of Ireland where Protestants predominate. He comes from that portion of Ireland where this propaganda originates. I desire to quote just briefly from a portion of a speech that this Presbyterian minister made while he was here in America. I might add that when Dr. Irwin went back to Ireland he was arrested and thrown into jail and remained in prison for several weeks.

I read first a sentence from Dr. Irwin which does not bear directly on the religious question, but does bear directly on the Irish question. He says:

> The whole question of Ireland is not merely a question for Ireland and England; it is a question for the whole world. What did your sons and fathers and brothers fight for?

Remember he was making this speech in America.

> Was it not for liberty, for democracy, for freedom of nations great and small? And you have applied some of these principles to the nations of the Central Empire, to Poland, to Jugo-Slavia, to Czechoslovakia, to Belgium, and the world is asking, "Why, in the name of common sense, do you not apply the same principles to Ireland?"

He says further:

> I want to say more: If every single British soldier was removed from Ireland to-morrow there would not be a single drop of blood shed. I want to say further that it is the presence of these British soldiers that is the cause of all the crime and all the outrages to-day.

Now, I quote the doctor on the religious question. He says:

> Further, in regard to the religious question, I have sat on committees for over 15 years with Roman Catholics and Protestant Orangemen of all denominations, dealing with questions affecting all creeds and classes, and never once in all these years did the question of religion crop up to give us any trouble whatever.
> Or, if you look at it from another point of view, the Presbyterian Church has in the south and west of Ireland a hundred or more congregations scattered amongst preponderatingly Catholic populations, and never in our experience have these people or their ministers suffered any annoyance, intolerance, or interference in their work there from their Roman Catholic fellow countrymen. I knew this perfectly well, but I wanted to make sure that I was right, and I wrote to four of our ministers, one in the extreme south, one in the west, one in the midlands, and one in Dublin. I asked them each two questions: First, "Have you or your people ever experienced any trouble, annoyance, intolerance, or interference from your Roman Catholic fellow citizens?" Second, "Do your people fear or anticipate any form of persecution or annoyance in any form under Irish self-government in the future?" The answer was in all four cases: "We have never experienced any annoyance, intolerance, or interference—rather the reverse; we have experienced the very greatest kindness and courtesy, and often we have had help, financial and otherwise. Neither do we anticipate any annoyance, interference, or intolerance from Irish self-government."

Later on he says:

> As a matter of fact, our divisions in Ireland are like the divisions in any civilized country in the world—political and economic, and not religious.

After discussing that question at some considerable length, he says:

> If you only reflect for a moment, it shows you that all this talk of Catholic and Protestant is downright insincerity.

Mr. President, in Ireland there were, according to the census of 1911, 1,147,594 Protestants and 3,242,570 Catholics. This includes the population of Ireland entire, both the Protestants and Catholics of the so-called Protestant section known as Ulster. In Ulster proper there are 890,880 Protestants and 690,816 Catholics. This leaves in the remainder of Ireland, outside of Ulster, 2,551,754 Catholics and only 256,714 Protestants. If the Protestants were being abused, coerced, and boycotted, would we not hear from this small minority of Protestants—in round numbers only about 250,000 against 2,000,000 Catholics—making a claim of such coercion; and yet, since the declaration of independence in January, 1919, there is not on record a single case of attack upon the life or the property of any Protestant by any Catholic. These Protestants, scattered through that part of Ireland where Catholics are in such a large majority, without exception, so far as I have been able to find, ridicule the idea that there is any religious question involved in this struggle. They are as enthusiastic for the independence of Ireland as are their more numerous Catholic neighbors. Miss O'Brien, who is head organizer in Ireland of the Gaelic League, is a Protestant, and I have seen a letter from her in which she states that the rising spirit of Irish nationalism is uniting Catholic and Protestant in a common bond of unity.

I have no patience with the religious bigot, whether he be a Catholic priest or a Methodist minister. I know that there are members of the Catholic Church who, were they placed in power, would be oppressive to Protestants, and I know that there are Methodist clergymen and Presbyterian ministers who would oppress the Catholics if they had a country in their power. While I am not questioning the honesty of these religious fanatics, yet we are to be congratulated, the world is to be congratulated, that in every Christian church, Protestant or Catholic, such people are in a small minority. The Irish Catholics and the Irish Protestants are not thinking of their religions in this great strife. They are working side by side for human freedom. They respect each other's religion, but there is no religious quarrel between them. Freedom is not a question of religion. It springs up in the breast of the Catholic and the Protestant alike. It thrives and grows in the bosom of the atheist. It is a common heritage of civilized man. Every civilized person wants to be free, and his desire for freedom is entirely independent of his religious views. Protestant, as I am, I would be ashamed of Protestantism if I were not willing to extend the same political freedom to the Catholic that I claim for myself. The desire for freedom is no such thing that any person or any sect can have a monopoly of it. It is not something that can be measured in quantity. It exists in the air we breathe. It is exemplified in the rippling brook as it winds its way to the sea. Its song is heard among the rustling branches of the trees and its gentle voice breathes through the soul a message of love and fraternity to all mankind. The heart that is imbued with the real spirit of human liberty seeks to give the same boon to his fellow men wherever they may be and whatever may be their condition and their belief. Like the grace of God, it grows upon itself. It spreads and promotes its silent influence wherever civilization prevails. The real spirit of liberty is absolutely unselfish. The heart that is imbued and controlled by its influence desires instead of impeding its growth that it be implanted in the hearts of all men. It is the highest symbol of civilization. It is the connecting link between God and man.

In conclusion, it can safely and truthfully be said that the Irish people, without any question whatever, are competent and able to govern themselves;

That there is almost a unanimous judgment amongst them that they should be permitted to do so;

That the giving of freedom to Ireland would not injure the British Empire, but, on the other hand, would greatly strengthen her and extend her influence for good throughout the world and through all the coming years;

That there is no religious question involved in the issue;

That there is a strong and growing sentiment in England herself among her greatest and her best people that Ireland should be permitted to make her own laws for her own government in her own way;

That the acknowledgment by England of Irish independence would be hailed with delight and satisfaction over the entire civilized world and that Ireland, like the American colonies, has the right to be free and independent.

This being true, what shall America say? What shall the descendants of the forefathers of our Republic do? If we are worthy followers of the courageous fathers of Revolutionary days, shall we not, at least, protest to the world in favor of Ireland? What condition of oppression existed in our fathers' days with reference to our country that does not exist now with reference to Ireland?

Our forefathers said, referring to the King of Great Britain:

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, ruined our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

In this sentence they summed up the charges contained in the immortal Declaration of Independence. Every charge made against Great Britain on behalf of America then is true of Ireland now, and shall we, the descendants of such forefathers, having enjoyed for more than a century the liberty brought about by their courageous acts, remain silent without protesting while Ireland suffers ten times greater than our forefathers suffered? Having obtained our own freedom, shall we selfishly close our eyes to the last English-speaking nation that is now held in subjection against its will? Can we fully enjoy the liberty which by the sacrifices of our forefathers we have inherited while listening to the cry of stricken Ireland? Do we really appreciate that had it not been for succor that has been sent from America and other parts of the world to Ireland, a large portion of her women and children during the winter that has just passed would have died of starvation? Can we enjoy our own firesides in the midst of our families while we know that Irish women and Irish children are being driven hungry and naked from their homes and are subjected to all kinds of ill treatment as they watch through blinding tears the destruction of hearthstones that are the result of years of toil and strife?

In the name of liberty and the freedom for which our forefathers fought; in the name of the silent voice of conscience that breathes forth from the soul of every free man and woman; in the name of Christian civilization; in the name of progress and humanity, I appeal to the Senate to express the sentiment of the American people by protesting before a suffering, waiting world against the cruelties that are being heaped upon the Irish people and demand for this long-suffering but courageous and determined race the same freedom, the same liberty that by the will of Almighty God and the sacrifices of our forefathers we ourselves enjoy.

APPENDIX A.

MANIFESTO OF LEADERS OF THE INTELLECTUAL LIFE OF GREAT BRITAIN ON IRELAND.

We, the undersigned, practicing the arts, the humaner letters, and the abstract sciences, or belonging to the churches and the learned professions of this country, being neither active nor interested politicians, view with profound humiliation the present state of the kingdom of Ireland.

We see our country, which in the past and until very lately made great sacrifices, thinking that it made them for the cause of oppressed peoples, now presenting to the world the aspect of a land hardly equaled in the past for ignorant and unavailing coercion, that coercion being practiced upon a nation that coequally with ourselves has inherited our traditions of individual liberty. This not because of any native ferocity, greed of gain, or thirst for rapine in our people, but because of irresolution, incapacity, and misreading of facts by those who hold the reins of our Government.

We therefore call upon the present ministry to find immediate means of arbitration or mediation between ourselves and the people of Ireland. And if the organized shedding of blood, whether by the natives of Ireland or His Majesty's forces, or arsons, robberies, and requisitions by either party shall continue, we demand the resignation of His Majesty's government, and declare ourselves resolved in that case to leave unmade no effort to substitute one that will have for its first and most urgent business that of finding the means of mediation until permanent peace shall be restored to the sister kingdom.

CROZIER ACCUSES CROWN FORCES OF MURDER AND ARSON IN IRELAND—DECLARES CADET CONFESSED TO KILLING OF FATHER GRIFFIN IN GALWAY—SWEARS HIGH OFFICIALS SUPPRESSED EVIDENCE—GIVES MANY INSTANCES OF TERRORISM.

LONDON, May 24.

Sensational charges are made in the Daily News by Brig. Gen. Crozier, lately commander of the auxiliary division of the Royal Irish Constabulary, against the authors and instruments of the present régime in Ireland.

Gen. Crozier asserts cases of murder, arson, looting, and other forms of terrorism were practiced by the Crown forces during the six months he held his Irish command, and it was in consequence of his determination to enforce discipline and put an end to police crime that his position was deliberately rendered impossible and resignation forced upon him. These accusations are embodied in a bulky dossier, each supported by sworn evidence, and many affidavits have already been taken.

The charges are specific in character and are made, in several instances, against men occupying high positions whose names are set down. The disclosures are set forth as follows:

1. Disguised as members of the Irish republican army a company of auxiliaries, Gen. Crozier says, held up the post office at Kilkenny last September, gagged and bound the mail sorters, and opened 20 bags of mail. All the money found—a considerable sum—except £29, which was returned to police headquarters, was stolen and the letters thrown in the river. Telephone wires were cut and the district isolated by the police themselves as a blind.

The company commander resigned soon after this operation took place. The auxiliary division had only recently been formed, and its development, the charges assert, dates from the precedent officially set on this occasion.

2. A captain resigned his command after a fortnight on account of what he described as "the methods in vogue." Information as to the nature of these methods was subsequently obtained, and was found to relate to the treatment of prisoners.

3. Gen. Crozier says he is prepared to swear he was informed, after leaving the force, by a certain cadet that he (the cadet) had murdered Father Griffin in county Galway, and that a certain officer, whose name is given, stood by and later buried the body in a bog. The officer is now alleged to occupy a position of great responsibility in Ireland.

The general states that a very highly placed official in Dublin Castle and a police officer of standing in the west were directly involved in the suppression of evidence bearing on the murder. He was himself, he says, intrusted with a message between these two persons conclusively proving this charge.

4. Gen. Crozier is in a position to supply important information relative to the murder of Michael O'Callaghan, former mayor of Limerick.

5. Gen. Crozier alleges a former member of the auxiliary division who threatened an exposure of the circumstances under which three men were killed at Killaloe "while endeavoring to escape" was "squared" by the Irish Government. The officer who executed this mission is now in London, the charges claim.

SQUARED EVIDENCE.

6. Gen. Crozier is prepared to swear that in the course of a serious conversation at Dublin Castle on February 17 with an officer in high command the Drumcondra case was mentioned. This is the case in which two men were said to have been taken at night in a car from the castle and murdered at a lonely spot on the outskirts of Dublin.

Gen. Crozier also charges the following words, or words to precisely the same effect, were used to him by the officer referred to:

"We managed to square the evidence in the guardroom, but I am afraid we can not do it here. However, I did my best to fix up Bland and convinced him, I think, that he was an accessory before the fact."

The general further declares some of the police evidence in the case was, as a matter of fact, arranged and that he was himself present at the rehearsal of a portion of the proposed evidence before a prominent intelligence officer. The trial resulted in an acquittal for the Crown officers and men concerned.

7. With regard to the Croke Park massacre, which followed the murder of eight officers in Dublin, Gen. Crozier states that one of his most trusted officers came to him directly from Croke Park after the shooting and reported:

"It was the most disgraceful show I have ever seen. Black and Tans fired into the crowd without any provocation whatever."

These seven items are merely selections from the mass of detailed evidence gathered by the general, tending to show the conditions with which he had to deal. Faced with the imperative necessity of restoring discipline and checking the police crime, one of his most valuable weapons was the power of dismissal from the ranks of the auxiliary division. Of this he was deprived early in November, and his resignation was the sequel to still further limitation of his authority.

Hugh Martin, the Daily News correspondent, says Gen. Crozier's charges call for a public inquiry by a select committee of the House or a joint committee of the Lords and the Commons. The general, he declares, should be called upon to produce his evidence and most thorough measures taken to protect the lives and property of any witnesses brought from Ireland to testify at the inquiry.

APPENDIX C.

REPORT OF THE BRITISH LABOR COMMISSION TO IRELAND.

The situation in Ireland to-day is nothing short of a tragedy, whether from the point of view of the Irish people or from the standpoint of British honor and prestige. British labor is vitally interested in the Irish situation from two points of view. It is concerned with the problem of Irish government and the bestowal upon the people of Ireland of the freedom which they passionately desire. It is concerned also with the degradation which the British people are now suffering in consequence of the policy of repression and coercion which has been carried out in its name. On the general problem of the settlement of the political problem in Ireland, the Labor Party has declared its policy. The manifesto embodying this policy is reprinted as an appendix to this report. Labor representatives in the House of Commons have protested against the policy of physical force applied to Ireland, as the Labor Party regards recourse to methods of violence as a confession of bankruptcy of statesmanship.

On October 25 Mr. Arthur Henderson moved in the House of Commons: "That this House regrets the present state of lawlessness in Ireland and the lack of discipline in the armed forces of the Crown, resulting in the death or injury of innocent citizens and the destruction of property; and is of opinion that an independent investigation should at once be instituted into the causes, nature, and extent of reprisals on the part of those whose duty is the maintenance of law and order."

This proposed vote of censure condemned the action of the British Government and its agents in Ireland and asked for an independent inquiry. The request for an inquiry was refused. The situation in Ireland did not improve. Indeed it grew worse, and the Labor Party, therefore, decided to set up a commission under its own auspices to inquire into the whole question of reprisals and violence in Ireland.

THE PERSONNEL OF THE COMMISSION.

The Parliamentary Labor Party appointed three of its members, Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, M. P., Mr. J. Lawson, M. P., and Mr. W. Lunn, M. P., to serve on the commission, whilst the executive committee of the Labor Party appointed its chairman, Mr. A. G. Cameron; its vice chairman, Mr. F. W. Jowett; and Mr. J. Bromley to represent the executive of the party. At the first meeting of the commission Mr. Henderson was unanimously elected as chairman. In view of the importance of the delegation's work and opportunities which it was thought might arise to assist the establishment of peace in Ireland, the Right Hon. W. Adamson, M. P., was persuaded to join the commission. Brig. Gen. C. B. Thomson became military adviser, and Capt. C. W. Kendall legal adviser. Mr. W. W. Henderson accompanied the commission as press secretary and Mr. Arthur Greenwood was appointed secretary of the commission. Mr. Tom Johnson, secretary of the Irish Labor Party and Trade Union Congress, was attached to the commission and the services of Mr. E. Rooney as stenographer were placed at the disposal of the commission by the Irish Transport Workers' Union.

Sir Hamar Greenwood, chief secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, gave every possible assistance to the commission. As a result of his instructions we were supplied with permits to enable us to travel by motor anywhere we wished to go and at any hour. We were everywhere received with the utmost courtesy by responsible officials, both civil and military. We wish, therefore, to place on record our sense of obligation to the chief secretary, to the officials of Dublin Castle, and to the responsible military and police officers with whom we came into contact. We do so the more earnestly because the main burden of our report is a denunciation of the Government's policy.

THE DIARY OF THE COMMISSION.

The commission left for Dublin on Tuesday, November 30. That evening it met the secretary of the Irish Labor Party and Trade Union Congress. On the following day a long discussion took place between representatives of the Irish Labor Party and the commission on labor policy regarding Ireland, the possibilities of securing a suspension of acts of violence, and the detailed work of the commission. Both the commission and the Irish Labor representatives were in perfect accord, and the latter proffered every possible help to the delegates. They placed at our disposal the services of Mr. Tom Johnson, whose assistance was invaluable. During the time we were in Ireland Mr. Johnson acted as a liaison officer between the commission and Irish labor, both in Dublin and elsewhere. The attitude of the Irish labor movement toward the promotion of peace in Ireland is dealt with later in this report, and need not therefore be referred to here.

The commission made Dublin its headquarters for several days. During this time evidence was taken at the Shelbourne Hotel, and visits were paid to Balbriggan, Skerries, Croke Park, and other places in Dublin itself. At Balbriggan—the scene of a reprisal on a large scale—the delegates visited the hosiery factory which was destroyed by fire, and the many houses and other premises which were burned in the attack upon the town on September 20. The evidence of eyewitnesses was taken in the town hall.

At Skerries witnesses were examined with regard to the shooting of individuals there. At Croke Park the commission reconstructed the scene of Sunday, November 21, and took evidence on the spot. In Dublin visits were paid to the Painters' Trade Union Club and the Women's Trade Union Club, both of which premises had been raided, and some of our members investigated incidents which had occurred in private houses.

In the meantime Mr. Henderson and Mr. Adamson interviewed Mr. Arthur Griffiths in Mountjoy Prison, and visited the Archbishop of Dublin. Mr. Henderson also traveled to Armagh and interviewed Cardinal Logue.

On Saturday, December 4, the commission visited Dublin Castle and had an interview with the chief secretary for Ireland. The chief military, police, and civil officers of Dublin Castle were present at the interview.

On Sunday, December 5, Mr. Adamson returned to Scotland to fulfill an important engagement in Fifeshire, and on the following morning Mr. Henderson left for London. Mr. A. G. Cameron acted as chairman of the commission during the remainder of his stay in Ireland. The evening prior to the departure of Mr. Henderson the commission met members of the executive committees of the Irish Labor Party and Trade Union Congress for the purpose of reviewing the Irish situation from the point of view of the establishment of peace.

On Monday morning, December 6, the commission traveled by train to Cork. We met the Lord Mayor, the senior Sinn Fein member for the city, and several members of the city council. The Lord Mayor kindly placed a room in the City Hall—since totally destroyed by fire—at our disposal, and offered to supply the commission with all the information collected by the city council concerning incidents in Cork.

We investigated several unfortunate occurrences which took place during our stay in the city, and a large number of witnesses were examined with regard to reprisals carried out during the past few months. We paid visits to buildings which had been burned, and to houses and shops where furniture, fittings, and other property had been destroyed. Members of the commission traveled by motor car from Cork to Bandon to see the hosiery works and other property which had suffered destruction, and to take the evidence of witnesses.

On Wednesday, December 8, we left Cork for Killarney. Owing to the suspension of the passenger service on the railways, we traveled by motor car through the southwest of Ireland. On Thursday we reached Tralee, which place provided us with abundant evidence of reprisals and terrorism. On the way to Tralee we investigated the circumstances of the burning of the cooperative creamery at Ballymacelligott and the so-called "Battle of Tralee," which is said to have taken place there.

From Tralee members of the commission motored out to see the Abbeydorney Cooperative Creamery and take evidence concerning its destruction by fire, whilst other members journeyed to Ardfert to investigate the shooting of a girl there. In this case, however, the commission was not able to obtain sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion that the girl was shot by a member of the Crown forces.

The following morning, Friday, December 10, we set out for Limerick, passing through Listowel, where we observed the shop signs from which Irish names had been obliterated by order of members of the Crown forces. On the way we called at Foynes, where a cooperative society's store and a workingmen's club had been burned down, and at Shanagolden, where the cooperative creamery had also been destroyed by fire and damage done to other buildings, and where an old man had been shot.

Arriving at Limerick we proceeded to take evidence, and on the following morning—Saturday—certain members of the commission met the mayor and members of the town council at the Town Hall, where further evidence was taken. Other members of the commission traveled to Hospital and Tipperary, at both of which places evidence was taken.

The two sections of the commission reassembled later in the day at Limerick Junction and entrained for Dublin. The motor cars then returned to Cork. At Dillon's Cross the chauffeurs were held up, searched, and imprisoned until Sunday afternoon. On their release they found that certain motor car accessories, clothing, and personal effects had disappeared.

On our return to Dublin we completed our investigation into the Croke Park case and took evidence in other cases. Members of the commission visited Dublin Castle and interviewed officials there.

On Sunday, December 12, we received news of the burning of many buildings in Cork, and at the request of the commission two members visited the city on the following day.

On Tuesday, December 14, Messrs. Cameron, Jowett, and Bromley left for London to attend the meeting of the executive committee of the Labor Party, the remainder of the commission leaving Dublin the following day.

It will be seen that our inquiries were confined to Dublin and neighborhood and to the southwest of Ireland, which is the most disturbed area of the country. We were unable, without prolonging the inquiry, to visit districts in which incidents have taken place that merit close investigation. We believe, however, that the evidence we have been able to obtain is more than sufficient to justify the strongest condemnation of the policy of the British Government.

The work of the commission falls into two parts—the inquiry into reprisals and the efforts which were made toward a cessation of acts of violence as a necessary preliminary to negotiations for a permanent settlement of the problem of Irish government. The first part of the report is concerned with reprisals, and the second section to the larger problem of peace. Before embarking upon a discussion of reprisals, however, we feel it to be necessary to explain the method of inquiry which we pursued.

METHOD OF INQUIRY.

Before our departure to Ireland we had received numerous letters calling attention to "reprisals" which were alleged to have taken place. We had, of course, in our minds the various occurrences in Ireland which had been the subject of questions or debates in Parliament. During the whole of our stay in Ireland cases for inquiry were constantly being brought to our notice. By every post there came suggestions or appeals for investigation into "reprisals" of which the writers had knowledge. Telephone messages and telegrams called attention to acts of violence committed in various places in Ireland by armed forces of the Crown. Personal callers came to bring "reprisals" to our notice.

It was obvious from the commencement of our investigation that to attempt to inquire into all the allegations of "reprisals" which in one way or another were forced upon our attention was to attempt the impossible. Some method of selection of cases for investigation was essential. We therefore decided to examine various types of cases. We could, of course, have done this within easy reach of Dublin; but we were unanimous in the view that our inquiry would not be complete unless we visited the more disturbed areas in Ireland. Our representative cases are drawn, therefore, from Dublin and from the southwest of Ireland, though we have received sworn statements relating to "reprisals" in other parts of the country.

The cases dealt with in this report fall into two groups—outrages committed upon the police and other armed servants of the Crown and upon those associated with the Crown forces, and reprisals committed by the Crown forces. The latter fall under six main heads:

(1) General terrorism and provocative behavior.
(2) Arson.
(3) The willful destruction of property otherwise than by fire.
(4) Looting.
(5) Cruelty to persons.
(6) Shooting.

Often enough the various types of violence are to be found combined in the same occurrences.

It was made clear to us at the outset that we could not accumulate evidence merely by relying upon witnesses coming forward voluntarily. We may say, however, that at every place at which we stayed people did present themselves to give evidence. It was, of course, necessary to visit many places to make observations on the spot and to take evidence from witnesses on the scene of the occurrences. But, in addition, we had on many occasions to go to the homes of people who could of their own knowledge assist us in our investigations.

In some cases we found it difficult or impossible to obtain sufficient reliable evidence, either through the absence of important witnesses, who were perhaps "on the run," or through the fear of possible consequences if facts were disclosed. The atmosphere of terrorism which prevails in many parts of Ireland renders it extremely difficult to gather information. Those who were eyewitnesses of incidents deserving of inquiry have been threatened with violence, and even death, if they disclose what they saw. We have information of one case where a firm of solicitors declined to swear an affidavit through fear of the consequences which might ensue.

The number of places to be visited and witnesses to be examined led us at times to divide the commission into groups. This had distinct advantage when it was necessary to visit private houses and small shops, and it also enabled more cases to be examined than would otherwise have been possible.

We should have been glad to receive the fullest possible evidence from official sources. Whilst responsible officers, civil and military, have been willing to discuss with members of the commission cases investigated by us, we were not supplied with copies of the official reports bearing on such cases. These documents are confidential, and we were informed that in consequence we could not be provided with copies of them. The chief secretary offered to arrange for the police or military concerned in cases we wished to examine to appear before us, but as in very many cases the men concerned have been removed to other parts of the country since the occurrences on which we desired their statements took place, time did not permit us to take evidence from them.

THE ARMED FORCES IN IRELAND.

There is a state of war in Ireland, and what are called "outrages" and "reprisals" are but incidents in a bitter campaign. On the one hand, there are the armed forces of the Crown; on the other, the Irish republican army. It will be well before describing the reprisals we have investigated to provide a background by explaining the composition, character, and temper of the opposing forces in Ireland. Only in this way is it possible to bring individual incidents into relation with the general situation.

The Government forces in Ireland consist of:

(a) The military garrison.

(b) The Royal Irish Constabulary.

(c) The auxiliary division.

In regard to (a), some 50,000 soldiers are at present quartered in Ireland; they are in the main young and inexperienced; few of them have had the training given to a recruit in prewar days before joining a service unit. The majority of the junior officers are equally ignorant of their professional duties; many in infantry battalions have not passed through the Royal Military College at Sandhurst. Under the conditions existing in Ireland up to and during the visit of the commission, these lads were continually being called upon to support the police against the civil population, a task which has always been distasteful to regular soldiers and should be confided only to highly disciplined troops. As a result training has been neglected, discipline has become lax, youths at the most receptive period of their lives have been brutalized and demoralized, and all this has been done at enormous cost to the taxpayer.

Until the proclamation of martial law the military forces of the Crown had a purely passive rôle in Ireland. They were widely scattered and undertook no independent action; they formed a sort of second line to the Royal Irish Constabulary and the auxiliary division. Under martial law, the military authorities should, in theory, assume supreme command, and the rôles of the soldiers and police would be reversed. Although this would be a marked improvement on the existing state of affairs, since some order and coherence would be imparted to the activities of the forces of the Crown, unless martial law is applied to the whole of Ireland (and this it is estimated would require 200,000 troops) it would cause deep resentment in the areas singled out for special treatment and do more harm than good. Undoubtedly, martial law, applied without distinction or discrimination, offers the most humane method of coercion. The cost of this policy, however, must be reckoned not only in terms of money but by the effect produced on the British Army as a whole. If a force exceeding in size the expeditionary force sent to France in 1914 is to be employed for purposes of repression, it can only be raised by taking all the men from the garrison towns in England and Scotland and exposing them to the demoralizing influences inseparable from civil war.

Under heading (b) are included the so-called "Black and Tans." Originally the Royal Irish Constabulary was recruited from men of Irish birth, but during the recent troubles resignations from the Irish Constabulary were so numerous that it became necessary to enroll Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Welshmen to keep the force up to strength. Most of these new recruits were ex-soldiers and at first retained their khaki while wearing constabulary caps and belts, which are of so dark a green as to appear almost black. Hence the expression "Black and Tans," a name whose point and humor have made it a catchword, although the khaki uniforms have now nearly disappeared.

Whilst we wish to avoid making any general accusation against a body of men with so distinguished a record as the Royal Irish Constabulary, we feel compelled to express the opinion, based on our personal observation, that a by no means negligible proportion of the force as at present constituted are men of intemperate habits and utterly unsuited to their duties. It may be that not more than 1 per cent of the Royal Irish Constabulary are men of really bad character. Nevertheless this small fraction has discredited the whole force as an instrument of policy by making it an object of general dread and detestation. Evidence in support of this statement was found in every district visited, though in some a distinction was made between members of the old constabulary and the Black and Tans.

The auxiliary division of the Royal Irish Constabulary is recruited exclusively from ex-officers. Perhaps for this reason a license is permitted among the "cadets" (the rank and file of the division) which makes their conduct depend more on the personality of local commanders than on instructions from headquarters. In Tralee the auxiliaries enjoyed a reputation for good behavior and moderation among the inhabitants, but in other districts which we visited they inspired terror as the authors of reprisals whose brutality and destructive effects were only equaled by the skill and forethought with which they had been planned.

In the auxiliary division the men who matter are those possessed of ability and education, who are inflamed by political passion, and who, so far as could be seen during the visit of the commission, were being given a free hand in the south and west of Ireland. Wherever reprisals have been scientifically carried out so as to cause the maximum economic and industrial loss to an Irish countryside or city, they have almost invariably been the work of detachments of cadets. Several cases investigated by the commission revealed the fact that these detachments had worked independently of, and brooked no interference from, the other forces of the Crown. In view of the recent conduct, after the orders published in the press forbidding all reprisals, they do not seem to recognize even the authority of Dublin Castle, and the question suggests itself: Under whom, then, do they serve? Some obvious deductions can be made from much that is uncertain and confused. This division is essentially undemocratic in its composition. It is a class weapon which is being forged in Ireland and could be used in England. Further, the method of its employment at the present juncture gives color to the suspicion that it is the instrument of those reactionary forces which dictate the Irish policy of the British Government. Hitherto reprisals by auxiliaries have been hushed up as far as possible, and efforts have been made to impute the blame for their misdeeds to innocent civilians. Evidently this force enjoys special and powerful protection. Now that martial law has been proclaimed in certain parts of Ireland, it will be interesting to see how far the detachments of cadets in those regions will come under military control.

THE IRISH REPUBLICAN ARMY.

The forces of the Crown in Ireland are opposed by the Republican volunteers. To speak of the forces of Sinn Fein as an army is misleading. The Irish republican army may consist of 216 battalions, whose strengths vary from 100 to 1,000 men, but it is an army only in name. This remark implies no disrespect for the Irish republican army, which, in point of fact, is a far more formidable organization than any army raised from a population of at most 3,000,000 could ever be.

The Irish republican army is formidable because it is intangible; if it functioned as an army it would have to concentrate to fight, and then it could be defeated without difficulty. But in its present form it lives and fights dispersed; it is everywhere all the time and nowhere at any given moment. Without the sympathy and support of the vast majority of the population, it could not exist. This support is probably more general and effective to-day than it has been at any previous period. Irish volunteers are fed and harbored by people who three years ago were certainly not Sinn Feiners, and some of whom were Unionists. So great has been the provocation by the forces of the Crown that 80 per cent of Irish men and women now regard the shooting of policemen and throwing of bombs at lorries with the same philosophic resignation that Mr. Lloyd-George displays toward arson, pillage, and the shooting of civilians at sight in the presence of their wives and children. Under such conditions it is practically impossible to bring the Irish republican army to bay. It might be driven underground by the use of overwhelming military force, but it will spring up again when that force has been withdrawn. Executions and torture are not deterrents; they have, indeed, the opposite effect. It is reported on good authority that the day Kevin Barry was hanged several hundred undergraduates of Dublin University enrolled themselves as volunteers. The destruction of creameries and manufactories only serves to stimulate recruiting by increasing the number of desperate men. The policy of reprisals by destruction, if carried to its ultimate conclusion, will ruin Ireland outside Ulster, but will not defeat the volunteers.

ATTACKS UPON MEMBERS OF THE CROWN FORCES.

Members of the Royal Irish Constabulary have been shot both on and off duty. These cases are regarded by Sinn Feiners, whether they approve of them or not, as "reprisals" rather than "outrages." They were, it is said, the outcome of the British Government's policy of coercion and repression manifested in the imprisonment of people without trial, the prohibition of public meetings, and similar acts. The shooting of members of the constabulary and the subsequent resignations which took place were largely responsible for the "dilution" of the old Royal Irish Constabulary by newcomers of a less desirable type and for the enrollment of the auxiliary division of the Royal Irish Constabulary, though, on the other hand, it is clear that the resort by a section of the Sinn Fein movement to a policy of physical force was itself but the outcome of a coercive policy on the part of the British Government.

Since the introduction into Ireland of reinforcements of the Royal Irish Constabulary and the embodiment of the auxiliary division attacks by members of the Irish republican army upon the forces of the Crown have increased in number, whilst the scale of operations has been enlarged. There have been several ambushes in which many members of the Crown forces have been killed or wounded. These incidents have been fully reported in the British press. But regrettable as these operations are, they appear to us less reprehensible than the murder of British officers and civilians in their beds on "bloody Sunday," November 21. Sinn Feiners have, as we shall show presently, been shot in cold blood; but "two wrongs do not make a right," and by whomsoever it is carried out and whoever is the victim, the murder of individuals unable to defend themselves is murder, whether committed by members of the British Crown forces or by Irish volunteers.

VICTIMIZATION OF PEOPLE ASSOCIATED WITH THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

The commission has obtained statements relating to acts of victimization committed upon persons related to or associated with members of the Royal Irish Constabulary. We have not had an opportunity of personally investigating any of these cases. Those to which our attention has been drawn are for the most part cases of what may be called petty victimization, though they are undoubtedly calculated to embitter the Royal Irish Constabulary. There are a number of cases where women employed as Royal Irish Constabulary barrack servants or women on friendly terms with the constabulary have received threatening letters. In some cases women have had their hair cut off. There are instances also of the wives or families of members of the Royal Irish Constabulary being turned out of their homes, which have been burned. Some official police reports concerning cases of victimization are printed in the appendix.

So far as we have been able to ascertain, the terrorization of persons in some way connected with the Royal Irish Constabulary has not been carried out on a scale comparable with the terrorization of the mass of the Irish people. Nevertheless the policy of victimization is most regrettable and has tended to embitter the relations between the constabulary and the Irish people.

THE GOVERNMENT AND REPRISALS.

We shall in this report deal in some detail with a number of the recent tragic occurrences in Ireland. The Government has repeatedly condoned reprisals, and the chief secretary has defended the action of the armed forces of the Crown. On numerous occasions in the House of Commons he has given a point-blank denial to statements made by members of the House on the basis of information received from nonofficial Irish sources. He has made assertions a few of which he has ultimately been driven, most grudgingly, to withdraw. The attitude of the Government, judged by its spokesmen, is that many of the unhappy events in Ireland of which the British public has heard during the past few months were either figments of the imagination or incidents in which the acts of the Crown forces were justifiable. The results of our investigations will show how much truth there is in this point of view.

GENERAL TERRORISM AND PROVOCATIVE BEHAVIOR.

In every part of Ireland that we visited we were impressed by the atmosphere of terrorism which prevailed. This is due to some extent to uncertainty; people are afraid that their houses might be burned; they fear that they might be arrested or even dragged from their beds and shot.

But terrorism is accentuated by other less direct methods. Lorries of armed men with their rifles "at the ready" are frequent sights in the towns and even in the country districts. We are aware that the Irish secretary would have us believe that these "brave men" might be shot by "cowardly assassins" in the streets, but we can not believe that for men to carry rifles "at the ready" is a means of protection against the possibility of being shot from a window or at a distance. This display of arms assists to spread the feeling of terror. The sight of "tin hats," drawn bayonets, and revolvers, and here and there of sandbags or machine guns or powerful searchlights is calculated to terrorize the civilian population.

But the insolent and provocative conduct of certain sections of the Crown forces is even more likely to inspire fear or to incite reprisals. In at least one town to our own knowledge the Royal Irish Constabulary often carry Black and Tan flags on their motor lorries, glorying in the title which has spread fear throughout the land. Sometimes below it will be found a small Sinn Fein flag, or the flag of the Irish republic will be trailed at the tail of the lorry in the dust or mire of the road. We would submit that no disciplined force would so deliberately encourage bitterness of spirit or inflame feelings of retaliation in this way.

We have witnessed with feelings of shame the insolent swagger of individual Black and Tans in the streets of Irish towns. We have heard raucous voices, to the accompaniment of the rumble of a police lorry, bawling the Royal Irish Constabulary song:

We are the boys of the R. I. C.;
We are as happy as happy can be.

Incidents such as these may not seem to be important, but who can doubt that in Ireland to-day they intensify the hatred of the British Government and its ways?

It is unfortunate also that the civilian population should witness, as many have done, members of the Crown forces under the influence of drink. A member of the commission stated to his colleagues that he had seen in the street an auxiliary cadet, revolver in hand, distinctly the worse for liquor.

At a railway station the members of the commission saw a number of Black and Tans (they wore the Royal Irish Constabulary uniform and were certainly not, to judge by their general appearance and accent, members of the old Royal Irish Constabulary) invade the refreshment room. We use the word "invade" advisedly. Their behavior was unmannerly, to say the very least. They shouted out the Royal Irish Constabulary song and, in general, made the room intolerable for the travelers who were inside when the Black and Tans appeared. Some of the uniformed men were worse for drink, and one Black and Tan lurched along the platform of the station, using his rifle, presumably loaded, as a walking stick. Again it may be said that these incidents are but small affairs. But such conduct must arouse feelings of resentment or fear, or both, amongst the civilian population.

In some places members of the Crown forces have compelled shopkeepers to obliterate the Irish signs over their doors and windows. This we know has happened at Killarney, Tralee, and Listowel. Such petty tyranny creates ill feeling.

One species of terrorism to which reference must be made is the publication in the newspapers or by means of typewritten circulars of notices threatening punishment to the general public if certain things are done or not done. These notices are not signed by any responsible officer, but bear a signature such as "Black and Tans" or "Secretary of Death or Victory League." Notices of this kind have been set up by printers at the point of the revolver. Some of these notices are reprinted in the appendix.

Perhaps the most potent method of spreading terror is that which is frequently adopted during raids and searches It is said that these must be conducted quickly, as the representatives of the police or military taking part in them are exposed to considerable risk. But this explanation does not seem to us to excuse the forcing of doors and breaking of windows, the flinging of papers about the rooms in which they are found, and the reckless destruction of household or office effects. Much less does it excuse the attitude only too often adopted toward persons. A peremptory order to "put 'em up" is, until it becomes a frequent occurrence, an unpleasant ordeal, but on night raids the procedure may be much more trying.

As an illustration we may quote the case of a local trade-union official. We do not for one moment believe that the Government can prove anything against him—unless to be a trade-union official is a crime—and we are convinced of his veracity. Some months ago he was arrested and imprisoned for five days without any reason being assigned. More recently he was visited by armed men after he had retired to bed. His wife and children were told to leave the bedroom. The man, whose only garment was his shirt, was told to put up his hands and, with the end of a rifle barrel placed to his bare chest, he was interrogated for a space of 25 minutes on matters of which he had no knowledge.

These are the methods of the inquisition. Intimidation of this kind but terrifies or embitters innocent citizens and particularly women and children who have in some cases witnessed it.

After curfew in Dublin we heard on several nights the firing of shots. As civilians out after 10 p. m. run the risk of being shot at sight, and as the police and military utilize the curfew hours for raiding purposes, it is a fair assumption that shots during the night are generally fired by them. We have been told that often this firing is not intended for purposes of destruction, in which case we can only conclude that its purpose is terrorism.

We have no desire to overstate the facts; but the atmosphere of terrorism which has been created and the provocative behavior of armed servants of the Crown, quite apart from specific reprisals, are sufficient in themselves to arouse in our hearts feelings of the deepest horror and shame.

THE BURNING OF PROPERTY.

A large number of buildings in Ireland have been destroyed by fire, but the Government has admitted only a very few cases of arson committed by members of the Crown forces. Generally, as, for example, in the recent great fire at Cork, the chief secretary denies the existence of evidence showing that the fires were caused by forces which, theoretically, are under his control. There is, however, ample evidence, in our judgment, to show that buildings have been deliberately burned and in many cases utterly destroyed by servants of the Crown. The premises which have been destroyed include creameries, factories, and other large business premises, as well as shops, private houses, and farms.

We give in the appendix to the report a statement showing particulars of 42 attacks made upon cooperative concerns, mainly creameries. In the large majority of cases the buildings were wholly or partially destroyed by fire. The economic aspect of this destruction we shall deal with later in this report. For the moment we are concerned more especially with the question of the responsibility for these reprisals.

(A) TUBBERCURRY AND ACHONRY CREAMERIES.

The Chief Secretary for Ireland declared in the House of Commons on October 20 that he had "never seen a tittle of evidence to prove that the servants of the Crown have destroyed these creameries." Over a month later, however (on November 25), he admitted that in the case of the Tubbercurry and Achonry creameries "the burning was committed by members of the police force on October 1 in an outburst of passion evoked by the brutal murder of District Inspector Brady and the wounding of another of their comrades on the evening of the previous day."

In the face of this admission it is not unjust to infer that other creameries have also been burned by the Crown forces. We do not need, however, to rely upon inference, for we have a volume of direct evidence that many creameries, besides those already referred to, have suffered destruction or damage at the hands of servants of the Crown.

In the cases of Tubbercurry and Achonry we do not know of the existence of any proof that members of the two societies were concerned in the death of District Inspector Brady. It is, however, clear from the chief secretary's statement that the destruction of the two creameries was a reprisal and that, either with or without authority, members of the Royal Irish Constabulary took vengeance upon the farmers of the district.

(B) BALLYMOTE CREAMERY.

We reproduce in this volume a copy of a telegram, dated November 3, from the district inspector of the Royal Irish Constabulary at Sligo, instructing the head constable of Ballaghadreen to "inform all available auxiliary force to proceed at once to Ballymote, where a sergeant has been shot." There appears to us to be no reason why auxiliaries should be sent to a place where a police sergeant had been shot, unless for purposes of revenge. On November 3 the Ballymote cooperative creamery was destroyed by fire. The society has no fewer than 980 members. We have not personally investigated this case, but we can not refrain from remarking upon the coincidence of the date of the telegram with the date of the burning of Ballymote creamery.

(C) ABBEYDORNEY CREAMERY.

The circumstances of the destruction by fire of the Abbeydorney creamery were the subject of investigation by the commission. There can, in our opinion, be no doubt that the buildings were fired by uniformed men, who used petrol for the purpose of setting the creamery buildings alight more speedily and effectively. The store, which contained a good deal of inflammable material, was completely gutted. The manager was ill-used. After the departure of the incendiaries 300 pounds of butter and two 80-pound cheeses had disappeared.

About a fortnight after the attack on the creamery at Abbeydorney two policemen were fatally shot. Later in the day a body of Royal Irish Constabulary men inflicted damage to property in the town. Since then the houses of the manager and the foreman employed at the creamery have been burned.

(D) SHANAGOLDEN CREAMERY.

The commission visited the village of Shanagolden. On August 24 an attempt was made to fire the cooperative creamery there. We were not able to ascertain the reason for this first attack on the building. We were told that the attempt to burn the creamery was made by Black and Tans from the neighboring village of Foynes. The cheese shed was actually set alight, but the flames were extinguished. Next day the local volunteers arrested a Black and Tan and a policeman in connection with the occurrence of the previous evening and marched them up and down the village street without their boots.

As a reprisal, it is assumed, two lorries of Black and Tans arrived at the village in the evening. They shot dead an old man of 75 years. At the inquest a verdict of willful murder against the police was returned. They burned a house and attempted to burn a house and shop, but the occupier's wife succeeded in saving it.

The Black and Tans were seen to sprinkle petrol inside the creamery. A 5-gallon tin of petrol was left behind by the party. Immediately after they left the building there was a loud explosion and the creamery burst into flames. A cardboard box, bearing the name and official address of a sergeant of the Royal Irish Constabulary, was subsequently found in the shrubbery. It is assumed locally, though there is no proof, that the box had contained explosives.

The county court judge awarded £12,000 damages. Cheese to the value of £4,000, which had been made for export to Great Britain, was destroyed. Prior to its destruction the creamery had been receiving from 200 farmers in the district about 6,500 gallons of milk per day.

On the night following the burning of the creamery four young men of the village were arrested by Black and Tans and roughly handled. One of them was stripped naked and, it is said (though we have not direct evidence), left 5 miles away from the village. On the same evening an attempt was made to burn the local library.

The destruction of buildings in a district other than creameries at the time the latter are destroyed and other acts of violence are not confined to Shanagolden. At Ballymacelligott men were shot and houses and other buildings and hayricks set on fire, as well as the creamery. A more detailed account of the incidents at Ballymacelligott is given in a later section of this report.

(E) BALBRIGGAN HOSIERY WORKS.

Creameries are by no means the only business premises which have been fired by members of the Crown forces. The Government has admitted that the fires at Balbriggan were caused by servants of the Crown. There were two hosiery works at Balbriggan. On the night of September 20 one of them (belonging to an entirely English company) was destroyed by fire. The company employed 109 people in the factory and at least 120 outworkers. The other hosiery works would probably have met a similar fate had not the Royal Irish Constabulary been dissuaded by a local resident.

(F) BANDON HOSIERY WORKS.

Whilst we were in Cork some members of the commission visited Bandon and there saw the remains of the factory of the Bandon Hosiery Co., whose premises were burned down on October 24. Two nights previous an attempt was made to fire the factory, but only slight damage was done. The company employed about 70 persons. The factory and stock were completely destroyed at the second attempt, and the damage caused was estimated at £50,000. At the military inquiry 14 witnesses deposed that the fire was the work of the military, and it is understood that the authorities admit this to be the case. The Balbriggan factory was destroyed, with other property in the town, as a reprisal for the death of a police officer, but we have not been able to discover any similar motive for the attack on the Bandon works, though it is suggested as a possible explanation that some of the employees were Sinn Feiners.

(G) PRINTING WORKS AT TRALEE.

Members of the commission saw the ruins of a printing works in Tralee. The damage done by the Crown forces is estimated at over £50,000. At the works two newspapers were printed and 30 persons were employed. The destruction of the premises is ascribed, though there is, of course, no positive proof of this, to the fact that the editor of one of the papers had criticized the action of the authorities.

(H) DESTRUCTION OF SHOPS.

The examples given above—all of them the subject of inquiry by the commission—will give some indication of the damage done to industrial concerns. Large business premises of other kinds and shops have been burned down in many places. We need do no more than refer at this stage to the wholesale destruction by fire of the premises of many important business firms in the center of Cork on the night of December 12. Before this disaster occurred we had visited other shops in Cork which had suffered a similar fate. We refer to incendiarism in the city of Cork later in the report.

At Bandon inquiry was made into the burning of a large haberdashery, stationery, and boot store. Men in uniform were seen to throw petrol on the shop windows and doors, and bombs through the windows. These exploded and flames broke out. The upper part of the building was used as a dwelling and several people were in bed when the fire occurred. They succeeded in escaping, the girls clad only in their nightdresses. The house and shop were entirely destroyed.

(I) DESTRUCTION OF FARMS AND PRIVATE HOUSES.

Other cases of arson in which shops and stores suffered serious damage or entire destruction could be given. But our purpose is to give examples which we investigated. The commission made inquiries into the burning of a farm, the tenant of which was an aged and bedridden woman of 75 years. Members of the commission found the house and farm buildings in ruins, with the exception of a small fowl house. This shelter, without windows and lighted only when the door is open, was occupied by the two daughters of the old lady, and a boy of about 8 years, their nephew. They are living now under deplorable conditions. The tenant of the farm has been removed to the workhouse. Two policemen and a number of men in civilian dress came to the farm and asked for a son of the tenant. He was not at home. The occupants of the house were told to "clear out." The old lady, who was ill, was taken outside, and the two sisters, partly dressed and without boots, together with the small boy in his nightshirt, left the house. The men poured petrol on the beds and furniture, on the outhouses and pigsty, and even on the pigs and poultry. The buildings were burned to the ground, the fowls were all burned to death, but the pigs were rescued. The family spent the night in the fields. On the morning after the fire two full tins of petrol and some empty tins were found in the farmyard.

In Balbriggan many small cottages have been destroyed by the Crown forces. Many citizens of Cork have suffered the loss of their homes. The countryside has not escaped, for in our inquiries we came across hamlets where cottages here and there had been burned, usually by the Black and Tans or other Crown forces, as part of a night's program. In how many small country towns there are to be seen the charred remains of homes we can not say, but it is beyond doubt that arson has been committed on a large scale.

Burning is not confined to business premises, shops, farms, and private houses. Public and quasi-public buildings have also suffered. It would appear that places where people gather together are special objects of destruction, as we have already seen in the case of creameries. The effect of destroying public buildings is clearly to render almost impracticable the administration of public affairs, and to impose serious obstacles to the fulfillment by local bodies of their public responsibilities.

Before the final destruction of the Cork City Hall several attempts had been made to fire the municipal building, which had suffered partial damage before it was razed to the ground.

(J) TRALEE COUNTY HALL.

The Tralee County Hall, together with a theater attached to it, were burned out during the early hours of the morning of November 1. The hall contained the county council offices, the urban district council offices, and the offices of the harbor board. Uniformed men were responsible for the fire. An officer said to a person who had been roused out of bed by the fire, "Bad work in Kerry to-night. Three of the Crown forces have been killed, but Tralee will pay for it." During the fire there was shooting from the police barracks near by, and the soldiers on the scene of the conflagration had to take cover. It is reported, though we have no direct evidence of the truth of the statement, that a military officer was wounded by shooting from the barracks. After the fire the military assisted people to take back the furniture which had been removed from their houses in case the fire spread.

(K) INCENDIARISM AS A POLICY.

In the foregoing statements regarding the destruction of property by fire we have confined our attention to cases we investigated. In every instance, except those of the Achonry and Tubbercurry creameries, evidence was taken on the spot. We have received information of many cases into which we were not able to inquire. But we consider the material which we have collected to be sufficient for our purpose.

The forces of the Crown in Ireland have been guilty of arson. As we have pointed out, in a few instances the Government has admitted as much, and we have no doubt that, if the chief secretary were pressed to declare the facts in other cases, he would be driven, however reluctantly, to make similar admissions. Incendiarism is part of the policy of the Black and Tans and auxiliaries. It is, we believe, one of their methods of terrorism and revenge.

In face of the admissions of the Government as to the origin of the fires at Balbriggan, Achonry, and Tubbercurry, the general public may well suspect the truth of the denials of the British Government as to the complicity of their servants in other cases, even if direct evidence were not available. Such evidence, however, there is, and the legitimate surmises of those who mistrust the Government's statements are proved to be well-founded.

It has been represented to us, however, that the presence of uniformed men at a fire is no proof that Crown forces are responsible for the outbreak. It has been suggested that Sinn Feiners have obtained police and military uniforms, and that the fires might be the work of republicans bent upon creating hatred of the British Government. We can not believe that there is much substance in the argument. It is to be remembered that in many places the curfew is in operation. During the hours when most of the burnings have taken place the police and military were in possession of the streets, and any fires which broke out must soon have become known to them, and they would have been able, had they chosen, to drive off the incendiaries. We have not received evidence of any street battles, which might reasonably be expected to occur in these circumstances. Moreover, if it were true that arson was generally the work of Sinn Feiners, it is reasonable to suppose that the patrols of Crown forces in the streets at night would not have allowed the incendiaries to complete the work of destruction. They would, we believe, have taken all possible steps to subdue outbreaks of fire caused by men to whom they are opposed. In point of fact, however, there is overwhelming evidence to show that in the case of many fires, not only have the Crown forces taken no steps to suppress the outbreaks, but that, on the contrary, they have actually hampered those who desired to extinguish the fires. In a later section of this report, dealing with occurrences in the city of Cork, we refer to the cutting of fire hose by persons who clearly did not desire that the fires should be subdued. We also received evidence from the responsible fire brigade officials in another town of the cutting of hose by men who, it would seem, were members of the Crown forces.

Many of the fires which have occurred both in town and country districts have been those of houses occupied by known Sinn Feiners. Sinn Fein halls have been destroyed by fire. Public buildings in places where there is a Sinn Fein majority, or at least an anti-British majority, on the local authority have met the same fate. To suggest that such burnings are the result of deliberate Sinn Fein activity seems to us unreasonable and, indeed, stupid, more especially as in many of these cases people have been shot or ill-treated. We can not conceive even the most extreme and violent Sinn Feiners operating a policy which would result in destroying property of value to their own supporters and subjecting their friends to physical hurt.

As regards Cork, where there has been arson on a large scale, we understand that the Government take the view that the work might be that of a loosely organized body of people acting without authority. There is in Cork a body calling itself the Anti-Sinn Fein Society. We have no authentic information as to the composition of this intangible and nebulous organization, but it is suggested that it is composed of discontents in the town, many of them ex-soldiers, and also of individual members of the Royal Irish Constabulary and the auxiliary division. We do not know how far this is the case. But if the facts are as stated, the burning of the buildings by men, some of whom are servants of the Crown, argues the existence of an indiscipline for which the Government must be held responsible. This argument, we may observe, is inconsistent with the view that in Cork the fires are the work of Sinn Feiners.

Even if only a tithe of the fires which have admittedly occurred in many parts of Ireland during the past few months were caused by Government agents, the case against the forces of the Crown and the Government would, in our judgment, be amply proved.

DESTRUCTION OTHER THAN BY BURNING.

Fires are not the only method of destruction employed by the British forces in Ireland. We have investigated cases in which valuables of all kinds, including furniture and other household effects and documents, have been wantonly destroyed. During our stay in Cork certain houses and shops were entered by auxiliaries and shop fittings, mirrors, furniture, pictures, ornaments, and crockery were smashed wantonly and thoroughly. Members of the commission visited some of these places and with their own eyes saw the havoc which had been wrought. We leave aside for the moment the looting which took place. Even if nothing had been taken away the destruction in the shops and in the houses of people who had evidently taken great pride in their home is in itself sufficient to merit the strongest possible condemnation. It is said that the excuse which is offered for this wicked destruction is that people in these premises jeered at the auxiliaries who were engaged in holding up and searching people in the street. According to the Government, the reason was that the police had been fired on in the vicinity.

To our astonishment, we find that Mr. Denis Henry's reply to a question by Mr. T. P. O'Connor in the House of Commons on December 8 stated that "the allegations of looting and of wanton destruction of property in this case, and in the other cases referred to, are absolutely unfounded." We can not doubt what we have seen with our own eyes, and we can not do otherwise than assert emphatically that the reports on which Mr. Denis Henry based his answer are untrue.

During our stay in Dublin members of the commission visited the head office of the Irish National Painters and Decorators' Union, which was raided on November 24. The secretary was arrested and the office searched for correspondence. In making the search the military succeeded in wrecking many of the office fitments.

The three rooms of the office had been left undisturbed since the date of the raid, and we were therefore able to see the disorder which prevailed. Books, papers, and correspondence were thrown in heaps about the floors of the three rooms; tables were overturned, pictures smashed, and cabinets pulled to pieces. A register of members was torn up, as well as other papers and correspondence. Even if the necessity of searching for documents be admitted, it appears to us unreasonable and vindictive to act in the manner in which the military clearly did act at the painters and decorators' office.

LOOTING.

It is within the knowledge of the British Government that there have been cases of looting. We understand that certain members of the Crown forces have been punished for this offense, but looting is carried on more extensively than the Government would be prepared to admit. Members of the commission heard from an auxiliary of cases where allegations of theft had been made against the Crown forces and where subsequently the articles assumed to have been stolen had been found. No doubt there are cases of this kind. On the other hand, the evidence we have received goes to show that a considerable amount of looting has actually taken place. There are obviously opportunities for theft where raids are being made on premises. We took evidence from a witness who stated that over £300 worth of goods had been taken from his shop. Shortly before the raid on his premises—which, it may be pointed out, was undertaken with a view to arresting a person in his employ—the dealer in question and his assistants had taken stock. The morning following the raid the assistants again took careful stock, allowing for the sales since the previous stock taking, and goods to the value named above were found to have disappeared. Sir Hamar Greenwood has stated that there is no truth whatever in the assertion that goods were taken from the shop; presumably, the chief secretary's information is obtained from members of the Crown forces who took part in the raid, or their superior officers. The choice is between accepting the word of the accuser or the word of the accused. We have formed the opinion with regard to this case that the allegations made against the servants of the Crown are true, as we can not believe that the witness and his assistants have deliberately invented a story of looting.

Witnesses who saw the burning of creameries assert that butter and cheese were in some cases taken away by attacking parties. In some instances we know that the produce of the creameries was destroyed or damaged by fire. It is also beyond doubt that in others the Crown forces looted the stores of the creameries before they were fired.

We have referred above to the destruction of property in houses and shops in Cork. On this occasion articles were taken from the shops, though Mr. Denis Henry, in the House of Commons on December 8, denied this. In many cases which came under our personal notice witnesses affirmed that during raids articles were taken from their houses. We can not believe that all the many statements we have heard to this effect, coming as they do from different parts of Ireland, are devoid of truth. On the contrary, we are convinced that there has been a very large number of thefts from houses and shops. We have also heard of cases where Black and Tans have entered shops, obtained goods, and departed without paying for them.

During our stay in Cork we received reports that whilst we were in the city people searched in the streets had been robbed of money and other articles. We were not able to investigate all the cases of which we had information. The cases in which we did inquire, however, were, in our opinion, conclusive. We may quote the evidence taken in one case, where we had corroborative information:

> At between 9 and 9.15 p. m. on December 6, 1920, I had just left my friend ——— at his door in ——— Street, Cork. I was walking toward my home when I was stopped by some auxiliary police. They ordered me to take my hands out of my pockets and hold them up.
> I did so and one of the auxiliaries searched me and took everything from my pockets except my watch. The searcher handed the contents of my pockets to the men behind him. They were then handed back to me in one packet and I was told to retrace my steps and go home by another route or I would be shot. When I arrived home I examined my papers and wallet and found that £48 in £1 notes, belonging to my firm, was missing; also £35 in four £5 notes, one £10 note, and five £1 notes, private money, together with £16 10s. 4d. in an envelope, being my salary for one month, had disappeared. I have not reported the matter to the police, as I fear the consequences.

Mr. Denis Henry, on the occasion above referred to, stated that he had communicated with the police authorities, who had informed him that "the auxiliaries conducted a general search of people in the streets of Cork on Monday and Tuesday (Dec. 6 and 7), but that the allegation of theft of money, or any other property, is entirely untrue." Unfortunately for the Government and its agents, there were too many well-substantiated cases of theft in the streets of Cork for this blank denial to be accepted. Frankly, we do not believe that a number of people would at the same moment suddenly fabricate stories about thefts. We are not surprised that the auxiliaries would not admit to the police that they were guilty of robbing persons whom they searched.

There are so many undoubted cases of looting and theft that the commission must add these crimes to those of burning and destruction with which we have already dealt. We were filled with shame that, in the name of law and order, servants of the British Government should be guilty of besmirching in the eyes of Ireland the honesty of the British people.

PHYSICAL VIOLENCE AND BRUTALITY.

Many cases of beating and other forms of brutality came to our notice, some of which we were able to investigate. Whilst we were in Cork we heard on the second day of our visit that during the afternoon auxiliaries with whips of the kind used by drivers of jaunting cars had struck pedestrians with them. We did not actually see the occurrence, but we took evidence from a town councilor who had witnessed the incident. The auxiliaries appear to have driven people before them, lashing the while with the whips. Most of the people who were struck did not protest, probably through fear of worse consequences; but one man who did was called "An Irish swine"—an epithet commonly applied by many members of the Crown forces to the people of Ireland. The event naturally created deep resentment in the city.

In some places there has been a good deal of flogging of people. We had before us in one town a witness with a record of 14 years' service in an Irish regiment. He served through the late war and was a company sergeant major. Whilst in the street he was seized by five police and searched. The statement he made may be given in his own words:

> Then they accused me of teaching Sinn Feiners the use of machine guns. This I at once denied and said, "You should arrest me and put me on trial if you make such a serious charge against me." One of the police then called me ——— bastard, and used other very vile language to me. I was compelled at rifle point to kneel in the mud, and on threat of death made to take an oath that I was not a Sinn Feiner. A framed photo of De Valera was then shown me by one of the policemen, and I was ordered to spit on it three times or be shot. I was struck and kicked. I was then ordered to get up and clear off. I did so, but was followed by about 12 policemen, who again set on me and very severely beat me with rifles, fists, and feet. I was knocked to the ground and kicked whilst there. These men were not English; they all spoke with an Irish accent, and one who spoke with a strong brogue served me worst. He said after a time, "Let him go; he has had enough," but when the others desisted and I rose, he felled me again. I was eventually allowed to go, but two of them continued to follow me, kicking and beating me. I believed they desired to get me away from the other people and shoot me. Four or five soldiers, members of the regiment, came up and prevented the police doing me any further injury. When handing back my papers, they said, "Here, take your rubbish, and we have taken no quids from you, so don't write and tell Lloyd-George that we have done so." They said they were going to shoot every ex-soldier in ———.

At the time we saw this man he bore the bruises caused by the brutal treatment of the police.

The Black and Tans, at any rate in some places, appear to have taken to themselves the power to administer oaths. The following statement was given to the commission in evidence by a lad of 18 who had been searched and a post-card photograph of the late lord mayor of Cork found in his possession:

The Black and Tan who had searched me said I had a photo of MacSwiney. The man in charge told me to go down on my knees. I did not go down. He struck me across the face with his clenched fist. Then he told me again to go down on my knees. I did not go down, and three or four of the Black and Tans who were around pushed me down on my knees. The leader then took a bound book about the size of a novel from under his arm. He gave it to me and told me to hold it above my head and repeat the following words: "I swear that I will have nothing to do with Sinn Fein in future." I took no notice. Then the leader of the Black and Tans put the barrel of his rifle to my forehead and told me to repeat the oath. All this time I had said nothing. I repeated the oath. The leader then said, "Say 'God bless the R. I. C.'" I said nothing, and the leader struck me with his fist on the face and said, "Repeat 'God bless the R. I. C.' three times." I said, "God bless the R. I. C." Then he took a large framed photo of De Valera from under his arm and told me to spit in De Valera's face three times. I took no notice. The leader again struck me on the face with his fist. I made an attempt to do what I was told, but didn't actually do it, and one of the Black and Tans said, "They are very dry." The leader again struck me on the face. Then they all went away.

For refinement of cruelty it would be difficult to find a worse case than that of a witness we examined on the treatment he had received at the hands of men who clearly were members of the Crown forces. This man was taken from his home by masked men with revolvers. He was asked questions which, he says, he was unable to answer. He was kicked and thumped, and later received blows on the head from revolvers, and kicked again whilst on the ground. He was asked whether he preferred to be shot or drowned. He could not swim. He replied that he would rather be shot. The masked men decided that he should be drowned, and he was thrown into the river. Fortunately, the tide was low and he was able to keep his head above water. Two shots were fired after him. Then one of the men said, "He's gone where MacSwiney's gone," and left the witness, in the belief that he was drowned.

We give these cases as illustrations of occurrences which are not infrequent and for which we can find no justification whatever. Even if the individuals ill used were notorious and prominent Sinn Feiners and "gunmen," we should regard such inhuman treatment as a disgrace to those directly and indirectly responsible for it.

Unfortunately, in their work of hunting down people the agents of the British Government often act in a way which is terrifying to women. We took evidence in a case where a party of five or six men dressed in the uniform of the R. I. C.—one of them drunk—called at a house after 1 o'clock in the morning in search of a man of over 70 years of age. His wife and a girl were the only persons in the house. There was a violent knocking at the door and some one called out, "Hurry up or the door will be broken in." The woman opened the door as quickly as possible, and she was asked whether her husband was at home. Her reply was to the effect that he was not. The evidence of the witness continued:

One of the men then asked if there was any correspondence between myself and my husband. I answered "No," whereupon I was jeered at and asked, "Is it likely that a husband and wife do not correspond?" A man of about 30 years of age, dressed in civilian clothes, with his hair brushed back and his face smeared with some grayish-looking stuff, was with the party. He was more offensive and violent than any of the uniformed policemen. He brandished a revolver in our faces and abused and scolded the girl, asking her why she stayed in my house, and finally shouted at me that "If it is two years we will do for him." I noticed that this particular man had an English accent of the north of Ireland. After this, all the men went out; then one returned and came upstairs. A window was suddenly broken. I feared shooting, and told the girl to lie down. We both lay down until we heard the motor lorries going off amidst much laughter. After a bit, when all was quiet I looked out and found that two thatched buildings belonging to our farm were on fire, also some hay. There was a cow and a calf in one of the buildings, but I managed to let them out. I found two paraffin lamps overturned in the house, also a candle near the burned buildings. The next day I found that a large coal shovel, two pairs of gloves, a flash lamp, and a fat hen—but a very old and, I hope, tough one—had disappeared. It is a very trying experience for a woman of my age. For two hours, from 1.15 to 3.15 a. m., I was in fear for my life, to say nothing of my home. I live in constant dread of another attack.

Some members of the commission visited the home of a widow whose house has been twice raided. On the first occasion, about a dozen auxiliaries rushed into the house and asked for her son. Some of them terrified a delicate daughter whom they covered with revolvers and asked where two of her brothers were. As the auxiliaries were unable to obtain any information they went away. On the following night at 11.30 p. m., auxiliaries again came to the house. They broke in the panel of the door and shouted for the son for whom they had inquired on the previous day. The widow replied that the boys had been home to tea but she had not seen them since. One of the party went upstairs and sat on the bed. He pointed a revolver at the daughter who was ill in bed and demanded to know the whereabouts of her brothers, but she could not tell them. Downstairs the men roughly handled the old widow, saying that if she did not tell them where her boys were they would burn down the house. They placed a tin of petrol on the floor. The woman then told the auxiliaries that her son —— was in prison, but she did not know where —— and —— were. The widow told one of our members who visited her that she prayed for mercy. The men left the house swearing that there was "no bloody God."

This rough and brutal treatment of women is by no means the worst that is to be said against men in the service of the British Crown. It is, however, extremely difficult to obtain direct evidence of incidents affecting females, for the women of Ireland are reticent on such subjects. The following case which came under our notice is, we fear, but an isolated instance. A young woman who was sleeping alone in premises which were raided by the Crown forces was compelled to get out of bed and her nightdress was ripped open from top to bottom.

The cases of physical violence and brutal treatment which we have cited are, like the examples of other crimes which we have given, but examples. We could refer to more cases, but we believe that the reader of this report will agree with us that they suffice to show the infamous deeds which have been done in the name of law and order.

SHOOTING.

The people of Ireland have become accustomed to the display of arms. Men who are being searched or interrogated are frequently covered by rifles or revolvers. The Crown forces are "gunmen" ever ready to brandish their weapons in order to inspire fear or elicit information. Unfortunately, their arms have been used for a much deadlier purpose.

One of the most important cases of shooting on a large scale was the indiscriminate firing which took place at the Croke Park Football Ground, Dublin. This incident is dealt with more fully elsewhere in the report. We may point out here, however, that there were far more casualties at Croke Park than at Peterloo. The killed and injured—numbering 73 persons in all— included both women and boys, who it is safe to say were perfectly innocent victims. If the police succeeded in shooting a "gunman," they did so by a pure accident. The brutal murder of British officers on the same day appears to have overshadowed in the minds of the British public the equally callous murder of innocent people at Croke Park. We believe the second crime to be every whit as bad as the first.

We received evidence of a considerable number of cases of shooting—far more indeed than we can refer to here. We give, however, one or two examples. The following evidence was given by a father relating to the shooting of his son:

I was awakened by a loud knocking at our house door. I opened it and saw a group of men standing outside. One of them asked me where my son was, and I answered, "In the British Army." The man then asked me where my other son was, but before I could answer the boy himself shouted from his bedroom, "All right, father, I am here." Three men in the uniform of the Royal Irish Constabulary then rushed in past me to my son's room; they told him to get dressed and hurry up. He put on a pair of trousers and his coat. The policemen then informed us that they only wished to ask our son a few questions and would not keep him long, after which they took him away. There was a man in a trench coat and soft hat with the party and, from the way in which he spoke to the others, I concluded he was an officer.

After some three hours, as my son did not return, I went to look for him, and eventually on looking over a wall saw his body lying in a field a few yards away. I carried him back to the cottage. He was quite dead and had several wounds in his body, one in the left wrist and one at the back of his head. So far as I am aware he was not a member of the Irish Republican Army.

Another case which we investigated was that of a man who was taken from his home by men in khaki. Later during the night his dead body was brought back to the house and the doctor who came with it said, "They have shot the wrong man." At the inquest, which was held subsequently, a verdict of willful murder against the military was returned.

An eyewitness told us that he saw two policemen walk up to a man at the corner of a street. One policeman struck him with his rifle and the other deliberately shot him. The man died shortly afterwards in hospital. It is worth noting that the medical men at the hospital who attended the wounded man did not give evidence at the military inquiry.

Another case of shooting in cold blood relates to the attempted murder of a labor man. His wife told us that "at about 2.30 a. m. a party of military called at our house. My husband let them in. They asked him his name. The party searched the house and then left. The officers were polite, but the men were rough." Less than a month later "at about 12.30 a. m. I heard a lorry stopping outside the cottage and then somebody banging at the outer door until it was smashed in. I opened the inner door and saw two men in the uniform of the Royal Irish Constabulary. My husband was standing just behind me, and the men in doorway asked him his name. He told them; they then asked him if he was a Sinn Feiner. He answered that he was a labor man and councilor, whereupon both men shot at him with revolvers. He fell and I helped him to a chair and one of the policemen fired in another shot after me. My husband, beyond answering the questions put to him, never said a word to the policemen; he did not interfere with them in any way whatever. My husband sympathized with Sinn Fein, but was not a member of the Irish Republican Army."

In these and other similar cases into which we have inquired, members of the Crown forces have deliberately shot men in cold blood. These crimes occurring singly and often not reported in the British press are as revolting as the murder of British officers in their beds and deserve equally thorough denunciation. Even if the Irish victims were "gunmen," we do not think that this in any way lessens the guilt of those who committed the murders.

The chief secretary for Ireland has referred on several occasions to men having been shot whilst trying to escape. We have information which goes to show that prisoners alleged to have been fired upon and killed in an attempt to escape have been shot in cold blood. Where men are killed the production of evidence from eyewitnesses is impossible, though it is sufficient to know that in at least one case an examination of the dead body showed that bullets had entered in front and not in the back. In another case where two men were shot in circumstances which made an attempt to escape the maddest folly, one survived. An Irish lawyer has informed us that he has evidence from the survivor that there was no effort made to escape, but that the two men were deliberately shot.

We have heard of cases, though we have not taken direct evidence on the matter, where men have been shot in mistake for some other person. Such tragedies are the inevitable result of the policy of shooting men without making adequate inquiries as to their identity and throw light upon the methods of terrorism which are now in operation.

There is a large number of men in Ireland who are "on the run." We met many such men. Some of them were armed republicans and active supporters of the Sinn Fein movement. A proportion of them were members of the Irish volunteers. Others "on the run" are men who have little connection with the organized Sinn Fein movement. Amongst these are active trade-unionists. Those who are not extreme Sinn Feiners and are yet "on the run" are victims of police or military stupidity.

Men who are "on the run" do not necessarily disappear entirely. For example, in one important town all but five of the town councilors are men to whom the term could be applied. Yet they do not, unless special danger threatens, absent themselves from the meetings of the council. Naturally, however, it is difficult for men in this predicament to play their part fully in public affairs. Many men "on the run" walk abroad openly in the daytime, fairly secure in the knowledge that they will not be recognized by the Black and Tans or auxiliaries, as the case may be. The Crown forces, however, possess their addresses, and the innumerable raids which have taken place during curfew hours have been made, very often, in order to find men who are "on the run." The only hope of securing them is to find them in their homes. The result is that men in whom the agents of the British Government are keenly interested, in order to avoid being "looked up," as the phrase is, keep away from home. In some cases men have had to leave the districts in which they lived altogether. There are, of course, varying degrees of being "on the run," but almost all of those who are so described fear that if they once fall into the hands of the Black and Tans or auxiliaries they will be shot where they stand. Many men are "on the run" not because of anything which might be proved against them, but because experience of men, whom perhaps they knew, being shot at sight has led them to the view that once arrested they would have no opportunity of disproving any charges. Probably the attitude of such men is unwarranted, but it is a sad commentary on the way law and order is maintained in Ireland that men should be driven to a belief that, if arrested, they would be murdered without trial.

A GENERAL VIEW OF REPRISALS.

In the foregoing section of this report we have given examples of cases of reprisals and evidence of different kinds coming under the notice of the commission. We have not endeavored to search out merely the very worst cases. The majority of incidents selected for mention are typical of many similar occurrences. A number of the cases with which we have dealt do not fall under a single heading, and therefore, in order to give an idea of the various elements of terrorism entering into particular incidents or practiced in particular localities, we propose to refer to three incidents—those at Balbriggan, Croke Park, and Ballymacelligott—and to the conditions prevailing in the town of Tralee and the city of Cork.

CORK.

The atmosphere of Cork prior to the latest acts of incendiarism was beyond description. During the time we were in the city terrorism was at its height. Cork has perhaps suffered longer from the brutal domination of ill-disciplined armed forces than any other town in Ireland, probably because it has been regarded as one of the most important Sinn Fein centers. Within the past 12 months there have been three lord mayors of Cork. Lord Mayor MacCurtain was murdered in the presence of his wife. Mr. Terence MacSwiney died in prison. His present successor is "on the run" and carrying out his duties as best he can.

The proper administration of the city of Cork by the local authority has been rendered well-nigh impossible. Many members of the council have been marked down for attention by the Crown forces, and are able to attend the various meetings of committees only at considerable risk. Attempts have been made to set on fire the City Hall, and several raids have been made on the municipal offices.

The whole of the civilian population has been in varying degrees under the terror. During the month of November alone we were informed by the Cork city council that over 200 curfew arrests had been made, 4 Sinn Fein clubs burned to the ground, 12 large business premises destroyed by fire, in addition to attempts made to fire others, including the City Hall; 7 men shot dead, a dozen men dangerously wounded, 15 trains held up, 4 publicly placarded threats to the citizens of Cork issued, and over 500 houses of private citizens forcibly entered and searched. This by no means completes the list of incidents which occurred in Cork in the space of a single month. There were, in addition, attempted arrests which were unsuccessful, much indiscriminate shooting, and many minor outrages upon the people of Cork.

During the time that we were in the city there was provocative behavior on the part of auxiliaries, a large number of searches of individuals, a number of cases of theft from persons searched, the wanton destruction of property, and the incident of whipping pedestrians in the street. It is not surprising in these circumstances that the economic life of Cork has suffered considerably. As an illustration of the effect upon trade of the prevailing unsettlement and terrorism, we may refer to the information which we received that the receipts of certain traders in the city had during the past three months fallen by 60 to 75 per cent. This economic stagnation arises directly out of the state of terror which exists in Cork. There is, of course, unemployment in the city. People are indisposed to make purchases other than those which are absolutely essential, and few people from the surrounding districts care to come into the city of Cork to shop.

The commission was impressed by the sense of impending disaster which overhung the city of Cork during the time it was staying there. This uncertainty was ended by the tragic occurrences on Saturday, December 12, when the Regent Street of Cork was destroyed by incendiaries. By this date the commission had returned to Dublin, but it decided to send two members of the commission to Cork to make immediate investigations. The newspaper reports of the Cork fires conveyed but a faint impression of the terrible havoc wrought in the city. The most valuable premises in the town were utterly destroyed, large business houses and massively fronted shops were reduced to piles of smoldering débris, charred woodwork, and twisted iron girders.

Shortly after 9 p. m. on Saturday, December 12, auxiliary police and Black and Tans appeared in large numbers in the streets of the city, and at the revolver point (before actual firing took place) drove people to their homes earlier than the curfew regulations required. This was regarded by the citizens as ominous and increased the nervousness which had been caused by the ambush at Dillons Cross and the apprehensions of reprisals that were naturally entertained by the people. The streets were soon entirely deserted and the work of destruction begun.

The first of the burnings took place at Grant's extensive premises in Patrick Street, and during the night new fires broke out. At 4 a. m. the city hall was fired, and the efforts of the firemen failed to save it. It was completely gutted. But a few days previously the commission had taken evidence in the city hall of the unfortunate occurrences in Cork during the past few months. The city library adjacent to the hall was also destroyed.

The members of the commission made special inquiries regarding the origin and cause of the fires, and numerous witnesses were interviewed. They were unanimous in stating that the fires were caused by the Crown forces. Some persons had witnessed the entry of members of the forces into buildings which shortly afterwards were on fire. In some cases explosions occurred. Others, again, saw them engaged in looting. The smashing of glass and doors was heard as men forced their way into business premises for the purpose of looting.

Firemen of the local brigade received assistance from the military engaged on patrol duty during curfew hours. The old Royal Irish Constabulary men (as distinct from Black and Tans) were engaged mainly in conveying information to the brigade of further outbreaks of fire occurring from time to time during the night. Two members of the brigade were slightly wounded by bullets whilst carrying out their duties.

We would point out that the fires occurred after the Crown forces had driven the people indoors, and that during the greater part of the time that outbreaks of fire took place the curfew regulations were in operation. Eyewitnesses observing the fires from adjacent premises positively state that the incendiaries were agents of the British Government. We are of opinion that the incendiarism in Cork on December 12 was not a reprisal for the ambush which took place on the same date at Dillons Cross. The fires appear to have been an organized attempt to destroy the most valuable premises in the city, and we do not think that the arrangements could have been carried out if they had been hastily made after the unfortunate occurrence at Dillons Cross.

On receiving the report of the delegates who had visited Cork, the commission dispatched the following telegram on December 15 to Mr. Henderson:

Statements made by chief secretary in House of Commons yesterday concerning the burning of Cork are grossly inaccurate. Parliamentary members of labor commission who visited Cork yesterday convinced that fires were work of Crown forces. Suggestion that fire spread from Patrick Street across the river to city hall, a distance several hundred yards, can not be entertained by anyone knowing topography of Cork. We stand by our statements regarding the fires in Cork, and can, if safety of witnesses guaranteed, produce reliable evidence on subject. We therefore demand independent inquiry into recent incident in Cork. If Government refuse inquiry, British public will form its own conclusions.

The Government is undertaking a military inquiry, presumably on lines similar to those usually held, except that the report is to be published. We shall await the report with interest, but we doubt whether the court of inquiry will have at its disposal the nonofficial information which is essential to a true finding of the cause of the fires.

We may here refer to the misfortune which befell the chauffeurs who had driven the commission through the southwest of Ireland after they were dispatched home to Cork from Limerick Junction Station. The four chauffeurs with their empty cars happened to arrive at Dillons Cross about the time of the ambush. They were arrested by auxiliaries and placed against a wall. The auxiliary police refused to listen to their explanation or to allow them to show their special permits. They were told that they were about to be shot. An officer, however, then came up and said that they were not to be shot until they had been searched in the barracks.

They were ordered into their cars and told to drive to the barracks, three members of the force with revolvers accompanying each driver. They were then taken to the guardroom and searched, after which they were put into a small cell with seven other persons and detained until 2 p. m. on the following day. On returning to their cars they found that a number of motor accessories and personal belongings, amounting in value to nearly £40, were missing. So far as we know at present the missing property has not yet been returned.

BALLYMACELLIGOTT AND THE "BATTLE OF TRALEE."

The commission made a very close investigation into the circumstances surrounding the burning of Ballymacelligott creamery and the shooting which took place. In the first instance it will be well to give the statement made by the Government on the Ballymacelligott case. The chief secretary, in the House of Commons on November 24, said:

Let me come to the case of the creamery destroyed at Ballymacelligott, County Kerry. Here, happily, we can check the evidence printed in a paper that gives a certain qualified support to the right honorable gentleman. That evidence can be checked by officers of the Auxiliary Division who were in the attack; and it happened also that a very gallant officer from my own office was present, in addition to two journalists and two photographers. Let us give the story. It gives an idea of the facts of these creamery cases. * * * At Ballymacelligott, in Kerry, a number of policemen were fired at on the morning of November 12 from the creamery. They attacked the creamery, wounded one or two men, and killed one or two men. On the afternoon of the same day along comes this party of journalists and photographers, escorted by Auxiliary Division men, to the total number of 16. As they came near the creamery, which was within 20 yards of the road, I am told dozens of rifle shots rang out. There was an ambush. The trench part of the ambuscade is still there. These men got out of their cars, attacked the attackers, killed several, wounded several, and captured several others. They were fired at from the creamery; they were fired at from the manager's house of the creamery. That is not the end of the story. Those who formed the ambush got reinforcements and came back, and toward 5 o'clock in the evening the police retired to Castleisland for reinforcements. They came back this morning and went into the creamery. They found a number of spent cartridges in it; they knew they had been fired at from it; and, I say, as an act of war, they were justified in burning a portion of it down. It was within 20 yards of a road along which policemen had to patrol frequently every day. It was the center of an ambush. More than that, I had looked at the record of the manager of this creamery. He was a rebel in 1916 and * * * was sent to jail for nearly a year. He is the organizer of all the raids in that neighborhood. * * * These Auxiliary Division men went to the manager's house, knowing his record, and knowing that they had been fired at from the house, but they found a wounded Sinn Feiner inside; and naturally, being chivalrous British soldiers, they did not touch the house, but left it over the head of the wounded Sinn Feiner.

On November 17, in answer to a question in the House of Commons referring to the incidents at Ballymacelligott, the chief secretary stated:

I have received a report regarding this occurrence, from which it appears that a police escort, with a party of journalists, while traveling from Castleisland to Tralee, in County Kerry, on the 12th instant, were attacked at Ballymacelligott by about 70 armed men concealed near the creamery, and were actually fired upon from the creamery. The police defended themselves, and in so doing killed four of their assailants and wounded others, but the exact number of wounded is not known. Seven arrests were effected, including a doctor and his servant, who were attending a wounded man inside the creamery. The doctor and his servant were subsequently released, but the other prisoners have been retained for trial. The creamery and two or three adjoining homesteads, from which heavy fire was directed upon the police, and a quantity of hayricks were burned. The creamery was found to contain petrol and a number of spent cartridges. It was probably the headquarters of the local Irish republic in Ireland. The hayricks burned with explosions, due undoubtedly to concealed ammunition.

In answer to a further question, Sir Hamar Greenwood replied:

I have spoken to a gentleman who was in the ambush, and I am quite sure of my facts. During this particular day there were three fights in the vicinity of this creamery, and I am convinced of the facts that I have stated in the house. I am glad that I have been able to interview one of my own staff who was in the ambush, and happily escaped with his life, who was able to give me an exact description of one of these ambushes, and an exact account of how one creamery, at any rate, was destroyed.

We are not for the moment concerned with the chief secretary's code of ethics. Our main concern is with his statements. The information supplied to Sir Hamar Greenwood on the case at Ballymacelligott is, as we shall show, untrue in certain important particulars. Indeed, we would go so far as to say that the account of the occurrences given by the chief secretary is a caricature of what actually happened, supplied to him, apparently, by a member of his own staff. The actual story of the occurrences, so far as we have been able to reconstruct it from evidence which is well corroborated, is as follows:

On Friday morning, November 12, a number of lorries containing police and military stopped on the road outside the creamery. So far as can be ascertained, no shots were fired from the creamery or the neighborhood by other than Crown forces. It may be pointed out that none of the men who were killed or wounded were carrying arms, and that no arms or ammunition of any kind were found in the creamery. We are convinced that had any arms or ammunition been discovered the fact would have been stated by the chief secretary for Ireland in the House of Commons.

The members of the Crown forces jumped out of the lorries and the workmen in the creamery took to their heels and ran up the fields away from the road. It is not surprising that these men should have fled at the approach of armed men in uniform, especially in view of the events which had occurred prior to this date in the district. A railway worker had been shot through the neck two days previously, and a young farmer named Hoffman, of Farmers Bridge, had also been shot, and died from his injuries. The Black and Tans fired upon the retreating men. Two men, John MacMahon and Patrick Herlihy, were shot dead. The former was a farmer and a member of the committee of management of the cooperative society. He had brought a quantity of corn to the creamery that morning and was waiting to have it ground at the mill attached to the society's building. The latter was employed as a dairyman at the creamery. Two men were wounded. The first, Tim Walsh, the engine driver at the creamery, was very seriously wounded in the abdomen, and will probably not recover; the second was John McEllistrim * * * John McEllistrim, the creamery manager, sustained a compound fracture of the arm. The police appeared to have acted in an aggressive manner, except when in the presence of the officer in charge of the military escort. This officer telegraphed for the doctor and assisted with the wounded. A soldier standing near the dead body of MacMahon was heard to say: "Disgraceful; it's a shame." Shortly after the shooting the parish priest and a nurse appeared on the scene and gave assistance. The doctor, who had been sent for, arrived on the scene early in the afternoon, and after attending to the two wounded men who had been moved to the manager's house, departed to make a further call and promised to return for McEllistrim and take him to the hospital at Tralee. The Crown forces left and traveled toward Castleisland. On this occasion no prisoners were taken.

At about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day (Friday, November 12) there came along the road from Castleisland two Crossley motor cars and two lorries. In the cars were Capt. Pollard and Capt. Jones, the former an ex-journalist who is on the staff at Dublin Castle, and the latter, Capt. Jones, the personal secretary of Sir Hamar Greenwood. There were from 15 to 20 men in the party, of whom about half were in civilian clothes. There were a few men about the creamery at the time, but certainly not anywhere approaching the 70 men who are alleged to have been present.

On this occasion also shots were fired by the party who had arrived by motors. We have discovered that three men with rifles and bandoliers were seen walking up the road away from the creamery and the main road between Castleisland and Tralee. Some little time after the Dublin Castle party had opened fire shots were fired in reply from the higher ground on the left of the main road from Tralee. The return fire, however, did not consist of more than half a dozen shots. A search was made for the wounded, but not a single wounded man was found.

The doctor, who had returned and was waiting for McEllistrim to be dressed and prepared for his journey to Tralee, was arrested, as also was his chauffeur. Five men who were found about the creamery were also arrested. The party with its prisoners proceeded to Castleisland. On this occasion the creamery was searched and books and papers in the office were scattered about.

On Saturday afternoon, November 13, motor cars and lorries were seen approaching the creamery from the direction of Castleisland. At Ballymacelligott the party stopped, it is said, to look for the dead; apparently, however, no dead bodies were found. A few shots appeared to have been fired, but none by local people. Capt. Pollard and others who had taken part in the previous afternoon's proceedings were again in the party.

The creamery was set on fire by some member or members of the party from Castleisland. We have reason for believing that it was not the military who were acting as escorts, nor can it have been the prisoners taken the previous day who were being taken to Tralee. The Black and Tans tried to put out the fire. Those who would have attempted to save the butter in the creamery were prevented from doing so by the person who appears to have been in charge of the party.

As to the question of the trenches referred to by the chief secretary, it is undoubtedly true that there had been between Ballymacelligott and Castleisland, about 3 statute miles from the creamery, a trench across the road 3 or 4 feet wide and 3 feet deep. On the other side of the creamery, between Ballymacelligott and Tralee, there had been a shallow trench about 1½ feet wide across the road. But we have positive knowledge that both these trenches were filled in at least four days before the occurrences at Ballymacelligott. At Farmers Cross, some distance away, there was also a trench which had been filled in before the attack on the creamery.

The facts, as outlined above, do not harmonize with the statements made by the chief secretary for Ireland in the House of Commons. We do not believe that there was any ambush on either day. The story of an ambush is due, apparently, to the hectic imagination of those from whom the chief secretary obtained his information. It is said that spent cartridges were found in the creamery on Saturday, November 13. This may well be, as it is asserted that the police fired after the retreating men on Friday morning from the creamery. It is untrue to say that the Dublin Castle party were attacked by about 70 armed men. The statement that on the afternoon of Friday, November 12, four people were killed and a number wounded is without foundation.

The burning of the creamery and the killing and wounding of four persons are not the only incidents in connection with the Ballymacelligott affair. Sir Hamar Greenwood has admitted that two or three homesteads were burned.

These acts of incendiarism were committed on Saturday, November 13. We took evidence on these events and incidentally discovered that from one of the houses a small purse was taken containing four sixpences, a half crown, and 1s. 7½d. in coppers. The purse was afterwards found in the farmyard. The chief secretary suggested that there were explosions from the hayricks due to concealed ammunition. One of the soldiers told a witness who was alarmed at the repeated explosions from the direction of three burning hayricks that they were only explosives that the Black and Tans had put there.

The commission is strongly of the opinion that there are certain sinister features in connection with the incidents at Ballymacelligott on November 12 and 13, which should be the subject of an independent inquiry. We do not think that the Government should rely for its information in this case upon the ex parte statement of servants of the Crown, who appear to have acted recklessly and without a sense of responsibility. On the basis of the unchecked statements of one of the officials, the chief secretary has stated quite definitely that the burning of the Ballymacelligott creamery was justified. In our view, the Ballymacelligott incidents are as discreditable to the Government as any of the occurrences for which the Government or its agents have been responsible.

THE MASSACRE AT CROKE PARK.

The commission took considerable pains to elucidate the case of the Croke Park shootings. Certain points of fact had been admitted by the Government in official statements, and it was, therefore, unnecessary to obtain substantiation of points which were not in dispute. The commission were more concerned to secure reliable evidence on those points on which the official statements conflicted with unofficial versions or which the Government had categorically denied or glossed over or ignored. The evidence accumulated by the commission from actual eyewitnesses who were interviewed reveals certain important discrepancies between the official and unofficial accounts. In his official statement in the House of Commons on November 23, Sir Hamar Greenwood said that—

> The round-up and search of spectators was carried out by the authorities according to a preconcerted plan with the object of securing Sinn Fein gunmen who had taken part in the assassinations of that morning of 14 British officers in Dublin. * * * It had been arranged that after the military had surrounded the field an officer should announce to the crowd through a megaphone that a search was to be made by the police, and that no anxiety need be felt by innocent persons. The police force approached the neighborhood of the field while the military were encircling it, but before the military cordon was complete the police were observed by civilians who had evidently been specially posted to watch the approaches to the field. The police were fired upon from two corners of the field. Simultaneously men rose from their places on the grand stand and fired three quick shots from revolvers into the air. Of this there is indisputable evidence. It seems quite clear that these shots were a prearranged signal of warning to certain sections of the crowd. A stampede was caused not by the firing alone, which caused considerable alarm, but also by a rush of men seeking to make their escape from the field. They hurried mostly to one side of the field where a corrugated-iron railing was the only barrier to be surmounted. Through the fall a number of people were crushed. Meanwhile the armed pickets outside, joined, no doubt, by gunmen escaping from inside the ground, were maintaining a fire in the direction of the police, who returned the fire. The firing lasted not more than three minutes. About 30 revolvers, thrown away by men who had formed part of the spectators, were picked up on the ground.

The commission have no hesitation in recording their opinion that the Croke Park tragedy was not in the nature of a premeditated "reprisal." It is quite possible that the authorities had for some time been contemplating a round-up at Croke Park when the match between the Dublin and Tipperary teams took place.

But it would appear from Sir Hamar Greenwood's statement that the decision had been finally determined by the assassinations of officers earlier in the day. It is inconceivable that the forces employed in the round-up would not be affected by those assassinations, and accordingly it is only reasonable to expect that special precautions would be taken against any hitch in the carrying out of the plan for the encircling of the field by the military. Sir Hamar Greenwood states that the police arrived before the military cordon was complete, and it would appear from this admission that the round-up instead of working to plan was partially disorganized in its preliminary stages. Even if this initial blunder had not taken place the commission find it difficult to concur in the view of the authorities that the scheme was a sound one. Mass psychology is often a sensitive and uncertain factor, and mob fears are quickly aroused. This is particularly true in Ireland where the sudden arrival of Crown forces, particularly the Royal Irish Constabulary, has so often been followed by tragedy.

With regard to Sir Hamar Greenwood's assertion that the police were fired on from two corners of the field, particular attention was given to the point by the commission and every effort was made to bring to light evidence in support of it. The commission are, however, compelled to declare that in the light of the mass of evidence available this charge would appear to be quite untrue. Not one of the many witnesses examined corroborated it. On the contrary, evidence was submitted to the effect that the police commenced to fire almost immediately the lorries came to a halt. Rifle fire was directed down Russell Street whence the lorries had come, and also over the turnstile entrance to the football field at the spectators inside. The consequence of this was that a man was mortally wounded about half way down Russell Street, a young woman was shot dead at her fiance's side near the center of the field, and a small boy perched in a tree just inside the turnstile entrance was brought down wounded.

The commission was unable to obtain evidence to support or to disprove the contention that signal shots were fired from the stand into the air, and it is quite possible that if this incident did occur the reports of shots from the stand might have so synchronized with those on the bridge as to be practically indistinguishable to anyone at a little distance. That large numbers of spectators stampeded is but natural, and the indiscriminate shooting of panic-stricken men can not be even partly justified or defended on the ground that there might have been "gunmen" among them trying to escape. It was manifestly folly to expect the crowd to disperse in an orderly fashion after firing had taken place from the bridge. It would not have been an easy matter to have secured an orderly clearing of the field even if no firing had taken place and the officer had according to plan, issued police instructions through a megaphone. Finally, it is difficult to understand why, if pickets and "gunmen" "maintained a fire in the direction of the police," there were no casualties among the police or among the militant civilians and no prisoners with arms captured.

Our conclusion is that the scheme in itself was dangerous, that its execution was a lamentable failure, and that there was no justification for what occurred. Not even panic, itself a sufficiently serious reflection in the case of a disciplined force, can excuse the action of the police amongst whom there appears to have been a spirit of calculated brutality and lack of self-control which, as has been officially admitted, resulted in 12 innocent persons losing their lives, 11 being injured seriously enough to be detained in hospital, and 50 others being more or less slightly hurt—a grand total of 73 victims. According to the evidence furnished to the commission, the operations were conducted by the Royal Irish Constabulary and auxiliaries. The soldiers took no part. Finally, the central point of the Government's defense, namely, that the police were fired on from two corners of the field, does not in face of the evidence submitted to the commission appear to be tenable. Croke Park was a ghastly tragedy resulting from official errors of judgment and incompetence.

TRALEE.

Tralee, more than any other place visited by the commission, exemplifies the demoralizing effects of coercion, repression, and reprisals. The whole population seemed to be sunk in the depths of morbid fear and contagious depression. There is no curfew in Tralee, but the streets become bare soon after the hour of darkness sets in. The roads are narrow and in bad condition. There is little evidence of active public services. It is not to be wondered at. We were told that the local council, instead of meeting at the town hall, was compelled to meet in secret in some hidden ravine. Tralee had been the victim of reprisals early in November, the principal public buildings being destroyed by fire. When the commission visited the town the situation was comparatively calm. But the effects of the operation of "official determination" were very obvious. Petty tyranny, beatings, intimidation, raids, threats of violence against husbands uttered to wives, brutal assaults to make boys forswear Sinn Fein, to denounce the Pope, to spit on photographs of the late lord mayor of Cork, to chant the "battle cry" of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and innumerable other methods of terrorization, which were reported to the commission, had left their marks upon the inhabitants. We do not believe that any official document would be worth the paper it was printed upon if Mr. Hugh Martin were to meet some of the policemen who displayed a keen anxiety as to his whereabouts. Names printed above shops in Irish characters have had to be obliterated under penalty of vengeance. The Black and Tans used to drive about in lorries trailing a Sinn Fein flag through the mud. Even in Cork, where the commission found a noticeable nervous tension and a dread of what "seemed about to happen," the people were not nearly so reduced in spirit as those in Tralee. The very atmosphere in Tralee was deadening. The conditions there spoke eloquently of what the people had suffered under the Black and Tans. These have now been partly replaced by auxiliaries, and it is only fair to state that the commission were informed that the latter were conducting their duties with greater consideration for the inhabitants than they had been accustomed to experience prior to their introduction.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE TRUTH ABOUT REPRISALS.

The answers given by the chief secretary for Ireland in reply to questions concerning events in Ireland, and the statements made by ministers of the Crown, have been characterized by a disregard for truth. The official view of some of the occurrences with which we have dealt in this report is diametrically opposed to the view taken by the commission after investigation. The Government, on its side, bases its statements solely upon information received from its own agents. We fear that often the sources from which this information comes are tainted by prejudice. Moreover, the Crown forces involved in incidents which would reflect little credit upon them are unlikely voluntarily to report with accuracy the occurrences in which they have played a part. We can not imagine a body of Black and Tans guilty of the conduct described in this report, in connection with cases which the commission made the subject of inquiry, presenting a report to their superior officers in accordance with the facts. These considerations render the statements made by the chief secretary untrustworthy.

The sources on which we mainly relied, on the other hand, were unofficial. As was to be expected we have had pressed upon us the point of view of the victims of reprisals. Though we endeavored wherever possible to obtain the testimony of independent people and the official view on cases coming under our notice, we drew much of our evidence from people who had actually suffered from the actions of the Crown forces. No doubt some of our evidence was prejudiced by political bias against the British Government, as the evidence of the Crown forces is prejudiced by bias against the Sinn Fein movement. But we have, wherever we detected it, allowed for the bias of witnesses whom we examined.

We had every desire to state the facts as we have found them, fairly and without exaggeration. But even if the weight of evidence which we have collected is somewhat colored by feelings of hostility against the British Government and its armed servants, we think that it bears the stamp of truth in all essentials. Most of the evidence which we submit in this report rings true. The statements made on behalf of the Government, on the other hand, do not carry conviction.

But what, in the opinion of the commission, is even worse than the misrepresentation of facts is the attitude of the Government toward reprisals. Terrorism and outrage on the part of members of the forces of the Crown in Ireland are condoned, defended, and justified. Deeds of a similar character perpetrated by other people in Ireland are denounced by the men who give their support to "reprisals," by Black and Tans and auxiliary police, as brutality, murder, and assassination.

The fact that men are alleged to be acting in support of law and order under the authority of a Government do not place them above the law. It does not elevate murder to the level of a virtue. Murder in cold blood, callous and brutal treatment of innocent children, incendiarism, and theft are crimes and offenses against the moral law, even when they are committed under the auspices of the British Empire and in the name of law and order. Sir Hamar Greenwood has applied the term "murder gang" to the "gunmen" of Ireland. The epithet can be applied to those individuals who, in the pay of the British Government, kill people in cold blood. The chief secretary has identified himself with a policy which is a disgrace to the British people and which we believe to be unparalleled in this country. The criminal nature of this policy of violence is clearly seen by considering the essential features of reprisals and violence.

WHAT ARE REPRISALS?

The burning of Balbriggan is regarded by the chief secretary for Ireland as a reprisal for the shooting of a police officer. Men were shot, houses and other buildings were burned, women and children terrified and driven to the fields. The police may or may not in this terrible havoc have punished those guilty of the death of the police officer. But even if they do, it is a frightful procedure to inflict so much injury upon the many who are innocent in order that the very few who are guilty may suffer. The destruction of the creameries at Achonry and Tubbercurry in revenge for the death of a district inspector of police struck at the whole countryside about the two creameries, yet the burnings may not have struck at the individuals implicated in the shooting of District Inspector Brady. Reprisals of this kind are a cruel and inhuman policy, the resort of those whose bankruptcy of statesmanship is equaled only by their incompetence to deal with the situation which they have largely created.

Besides reprisals for specific occurrences there are the more general sort of reprisals—reprisals against all and sundry, not for this or that particular crime, but for the general attitude of the bulk of Irish people toward the British Government and its paid servants in Ireland. The policy of sheer terrorism and of brutal treatment to individuals is directed against the people as a whole. Again, the innocent certainly suffer and the guilty may or may not suffer with them. Reprisals and the whole policy of violence are condemned because they are inhuman, and also because by driving the people to revolt or sullen despair they but intensify the problem they are designed to solve by crushing it out of existence.

THE GOVERNMENT'S RESPONSIBILITY FOR REPRISALS.

Unable or unwilling to cope with the growing bitterness and violence which its policy of repression had enormously strengthened, the Government resorted to the reinforcement of the Royal Irish Constabulary by ex-service men and the establishment of a new type of armed force consisting of ex-officers. We do not wish to make any sweeping accusation against the Royal Irish Constabulary and the auxiliary division. But there are individuals in both forces—and the number we fear is not small—whose actions merit the strongest condemnation.

The worst elements in the two forces—notwithstanding the praise bestowed upon the Royal Irish Constabulary and the auxiliary division by the chief secretary—are undesirable characters. Disciplined control might have restrained them. But the outstanding fact regarding lots of the Black and Tans and auxiliaries is that they are not under control. The Government has created a weapon which it can not wield. It has liberated forces which it is not at present able to dominate. The men have got out of hand, and the Government can not truthfully deny it.

The result has been seen in the tragic occurrences which we have described in this report. The Government had no choice but to support its servants. It was represented to them that any other course would dishearten the Crown forces in the pursuit of their dangerous duties and play into the hands of the physical force section of the Sinn Fein movement. We do not believe that the Government directly and definitely inspired reprisals and violence. But it brought into existence a new constabulary, with its auxiliary division, which was undisciplined and virtually uncontrolled. The Government must take full responsibility for its own offspring. Moreover, whilst it has perfunctorily denied certain occurrences which are beyond doubt, it has associated itself with and defended the crimes committed by the Crown forces in Ireland. The blame for the present situation does not rest primarily with the members of the Crown forces, but with the Government.

THE RESULTS OF THE GOVERNMENT'S POLICY.

(A) THE HEALTH OF THE PEOPLE.

Months of oppression, coercion, and physical violence can not but have far-reaching effects upon the people who suffer under them. The future alone will bring to light the complete results of the awful events which have followed in rapid succession in Ireland, particularly during the past 12 months. We may, however, point to some of the consequences which are now obvious to all who have come into close touch with the Irish people.

It is clear that the terrorism which prevails has had serious effects upon the health of people. We may leave out of account the obvious consequences likely to follow to the members of a household who have been the horrified witnesses of bloodshed and violence in their own homes, and consider the effects of the terror upon those who have never experienced such an ordeal. There is medical testimony to show that the fear inspired by Black and Tans and auxiliary police has had the most adverse effects upon pregnant women. Children naturally suffer from the effects of a terror-laden atmosphere, and we are informed that the number of such diseases as St. Vitus's dance has considerably increased. A large section of the population is "all nerves." The strain has begun to tell, especially in those areas where the excesses of the Crown forces have been most frequent.

(B) ECONOMIC LIFE.

Equally disastrous has been the effect of the existing conditions in Ireland upon the economic life of the country. The creeping paralysis which has attacked Irish trade and industry is not without its influence upon Great Britain. Last year Ireland imported goods to the value of £158,000,000, whilst her exports amount to £178,000,000. The great bulk of this trade was with Great Britain. Instead of expanding (as with settled peace it undoubtedly would) it may diminish to the detriment of both the Irish and British peoples. At a time when unemployment is increasing, Ireland's economic activities are being slowly strangled. If Ireland were able to satisfy her needs, the effect upon British trade and upon employment in this country would be appreciable, whilst the payment she would make in the form of bacon, butter, eggs, cattle, and other produce would not be without their effect on the cost of living.

The stagnation of trade in Ireland is due partly to the destruction of industrial capital (in the shape of buildings, machinery, and other equipment), partly to the general atmosphere of terrorism, and partly also to the actual suspension of the railway service over a large part of the country. Fortunately, however, the railway service is to be resumed.

We have referred in earlier sections of the report to the destruction of creameries, about 40 of which have been totally or partially destroyed. To these creameries comes the produce of the farmers in the neighborhood. The number of suppliers of milk to a creamery may be a few or several hundred. The destruction of a creamery, through which a farmer reaches the market, obviously strikes a heavy blow at the agriculturists in an area, apart from the actual loss sustained to the cooperative society by the loss of buildings, equipment, and stock. The cooperative movement in Ireland has been built up in the face of enormous difficulties, and with great sacrifice and enthusiasm. It is in some ways one of the most remarkable developments of recent years in Ireland, and the destruction of cooperative creameries has inflicted a grievous blow on a movement full of promise.

The destruction of factories, such as those at Balbriggan and Bandon, to which we have already referred, of printing works, as at Tralee, Athlone, and elsewhere, of other workshops, and of large distributive stores (such as has taken place on a large scale in Cork) has meant both the loss of a considerable amount of wealth and a growth of unemployment.

The suppression of markets in many places has increased Ireland's economic troubles and inflicted serious injury, particularly upon the peasant population. In Killarney, for example, fairs have been prohibited, and the poorer sections of the community who fattened pigs for the sale have no means of transporting them to adjacent markets.

Moreover, the prevailing uncertainty has had an adverse effect upon trade everywhere. We have already pointed out, for example, that distributive stores in Cork have suffered very considerably in recent months.

One of the most distressing features of the economic situation in Ireland is the discouragement of enterprise. As an example we may quote an instance which was brought under the notice of the commission. A scheme was inaugurated for the erection of an abattoir at Waterford to serve the farmers in five counties. The enterprise was to be on a considerable scale, and £500,000 was needed for the purpose. Over half of this sum was raised when cooperative creameries began to be burned. The effect was to render it impracticable for the promoters to proceed with the scheme. If small creameries were destroyed, there was no certainty that larger enterprises would be secure. This important new development of Irish industry has therefore been killed in the birth. To put the situation in general terms, existing conditions in Ireland are creating stagnation and preventing the growth of new economic activities.

(C) THE SPIRIT OF THE PEOPLE.

The Government has stated that it is "breaking the terror" created by the "murder gang." The effect of their policy can not be so simply described. There are signs here and there that the Government's policy, and the intimidation and cruelty for which the Crown forces are responsible, might force a section of the people into a sullen acquiescence in the political government imposed on Ireland by Mr. Lloyd-George's coalition, and that the spirit of these people might be broken. We shall not count it for righteousness in the British Government if it achieves this end. On the contrary, we should regard it as the worst of the crimes which could be charged against them.

We do not think, however, that the real danger lies in this direction. One of the most fundamental results of coercion and violence is the intensification of the spirit of revolt and the increased bitterness against British dominion. We ask what effect the harrying of Irishmen is likely to have upon their minds. It is more likely to engender deeper hostility than to encourage conciliatory feelings. Even if such men were to abjure their faith—which is not likely—it would not insure their safety. Moreover, the murder or ill treatment of husbands and sons and brothers, the indignities to which large numbers of people have been subjected, the threats which have been hurled at them, and the provocative behavior of members of the armed forces in Ireland are creating a new bitterness of spirit which a stern and relentless policy of violence will only strengthen and can never allay.

FAILURE.

Whatever the Government may assert to the contrary, the policy is a failure. It may yield an apparent and temporary success, but the rising generation is being nurtured in an atmosphere of hatred for all things British, and until reasonableness and generosity supersede repression and violence the Irish problem will remain insoluble. The urgent question which lies before the British people is that of peace in Ireland.

BRITISH LABOR'S PEACE EFFORTS.

The national executive of the Labor Party and the Parliamentary Labor Party have been concerning themselves for a considerable period with the possibilities of bringing about an parties on both sides. The reception of this threefold plan by the heads of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy in Ireland and by the Irish labor representatives was so favorable as to encourage Mr. Henderson and Mr. Adamson in the view that if on their return to London they could obtain a satisfactory response from the Government it would be possible to make a beginning in the direction of peace by the issue of the labor commission's proposed appeal, countersigned by the responsible leaders of the two national bodies referred to above. The Government, however, neither definitely rejected nor actually accepted the proposals. The effect of this noncommittal attitude and of the prime minister's statement in the House of Commons was prejudicial to British labor's endeavors at conciliation, as will be gathered from the following text of a communication addressed to the prime minister on Thursday, December 23:

When you received the labor commission on Ireland you suggested that we might continue our efforts in the direction of peace and the cessation of the policy of violence. As the result of your statement to the House of Commons on Friday, December 10, the commission were in considerable doubt as to whether the representatives of the Irish Labor Party and Trade-Union Congress would join in the appeal which, in the more promising circumstances existing when the commission was in Dublin, they and the heads of the Catholic Hierarchy had promised to do, provided that there were reasonable assurances that such an appeal would meet with a response on both sides.

Notwithstanding our doubts, the commission, after our interview with you, Mr. Bonar Law, and Sir Hamar Greenwood, felt that they must act in harmony with your suggestion to go forward with our peace effort. Accordingly, we communicated with the executive of the Irish Labor Party and Trade-Union Congress, who have replied to the effect that, judging by your speech of Friday, December 10, there seems to be no prospect of the Government making an immediate response to the suggested appeal, and that in existing circumstances for them to associate with the labor commission in any such appeal would be calculated to do more harm than good.

We are not surprised at the reply to our letter, and feel bound, most regretfully, to say that as the matter stands now there is a deadlock which can only be removed by the Government. We beg you most earnestly to consider whether it would not be possible for you, for a limited period from a given date after the issue of an appeal for a cessation of all acts of violence indorsed by the heads of the Catholic Hierarchy and the Irish Labor Party and Trade-Union Congress, to undertake that, so far as the Crown forces are concerned, there should be no acts of provocation or violence. On our side, we would endeavor to obtain a similar undertaking from Sinn Fein, it being understood that you would call off reprisals only if Sinn Fein called off all acts of violence.

We suggest also that you should undertake during this unofficial truce to meet those who can speak for the elected representatives of the Irish people for the purpose of agreeing upon the terms of an open truce to continue, say, four months, and that during this period the 71 elected representatives should be allowed to meet to elect their delegates and formulate proposals for discussion with representatives of the British Government of the general question of a permanent settlement, each side being free to state its demands.

We feel sure that on these lines the present unhappy condition of Ireland could be terminated, and if you will on behalf of the British Government accept the proposals we have outlined you may rely upon the Labor Party and ourselves to give every assistance in our power.

ARTHUR HENDERSON.
WILLIAM ADAMSON.

The commission deeply regret that their efforts have not met with that measure of immediate success for which they had hoped. It has to be borne in mind, however, that the commission occupied the difficult position of unofficial mediators engaged in the voluntary task of attempting to create a set of circumstances that would render probable a conference between the representatives of the British Government and those of Sinn Fein. It is true that for the time being they have not achieved their object, but they believe their endeavors have not been entirely fruitless. Labor can render valuable service not only by helping to create the right atmosphere but also by pursuing its purpose of endeavoring to establish direct contact and official relations between the British Government and the Sinn Fein movement. The final solution of the Irish problem will not be found through a policy of violence or of vengeance. Ultimately it will have to be found along the lines of conciliation and consent by the more enlightened method of negotiation. The Irish people have faith in British labor alone among the political parties in this country, and we believe that if the labor movement will persist in its efforts for peace it will be able to make an effective contribution toward the settlement of the most difficult problem now confronting the British people.

CONCLUSION.

We have already expressed our indebtedness to the executive committee of the Irish Labor Party and Trades Union Congress, and to Mr. Tom Johnson, their secretary, and to the Irish Transport Workers' Union for their kindness in placing Mr. E. Rooney at our disposal to act as stenographer to the commission. To Mr. Rooney personally we owe our thanks. We wish that our thanks could be carried to the large number of people in Ireland who in various ways assisted our inquiry, for without their cooperation our task would have been difficult, if not impossible.

We can not close this report without an appeal to the British labor movement and to the British public. Things are being done in the name of Britain which must make her name stink in the nostrils of the whole world. The honor of our people has been gravely compromised. Not only is there a reign of terror in Ireland which should bring a blush of shame to every British citizen, but a nation is being held in subjection by an empire which has proudly boasted that it is the friend of small nations. Let the people of Britain raise their voices in a united demand for the rescue of the Irish people from the rule of force and for the establishment of peace and freedom and a new brotherhood between the people of the British Isles. Only by repudiating the errors of the past and the infamies of the present can the democracy of Great Britain recover its honor. Only by granting to Ireland the freedom which is her due can our people fulfill their great responsibilities toward our sister nation.

APPENDIX D.

To the Right Hon. Sir HAMAR GREENWOOD,
Chief Secretary for Ireland.

SIR: I beg to report that there came before me at the Hilary Sessions for the county of Clare 356 claims for compensation for criminal injury amounting, in all, to over £466,000. In a very large number of these cases it was alleged that the criminal injuries had been committed by the armed forces of the Government. I, therefore, directed that notice should be served by telegram on the proper authority so that the military and police might have an opportunity of being represented at the inquiry, and I adjourned the hearing until the following day. On the following day Mr. Cullinan, Crown solicitor, stated in court that he had instructions to attend as representing the military. A sworn verbatim shorthand report was taken of the evidence in these cases, a typed transcript of which I forward herewith.

LOOTING AT LAHINCH.

It was proved before me on sworn evidence in open court that on the night of September 22 "the town of Lahinch was attacked by a large body of the armed forces of the Government. Rifle shots were fired apparently at random in the streets and a very large number of houses and shops were broken into, set on fire, and their contents looted or destroyed. The inhabitants, most of them in their night clothes—men, women, and children, invalids, old people over 80, and children in arms—were compelled at a moment's notice and at peril of their lives to fly through back doors and windows to the sand hills in the neighborhood of the town, where they remained during the night, returning in the morning to find their homes completely destroyed." In the course of this attack a man named Joseph Sammon was shot dead.

There were, in all, before me 38 claims for the criminal injuries committed on that occasion, and after full consideration of the claims I awarded a total sum of over £65,000.

MEN SHOT AT ENNISTYMON.

On the same night the town of Ennistymon was similarly invaded by the armed forces of the Government. Shots were fired in the streets. The town hall and a large number of houses and shops were broken into, set on fire, and, with their contents, destroyed. As in Lahinch, the inhabitants were compelled to fly for their lives. A young married man named Conole was seized in the street by a party of men under command of an officer. His wife, who was with him, pleaded on her knees with the officer for the life of her husband, but he was taken away a short distance, shot, and his charred remains were found next morning in his own house, which had been burnt. Another young man named Linnane was shot dead in the streets while attempting to extinguish the flames. For the criminal injuries committed in the progress of this attack there were 13 claims, and I awarded upward of £39,000 compensation.

MURDER AT MILTOWN-MALBAY.

On the same night the town of Miltown-Malbay was similarly invaded by the armed forces of the Government. A large number of houses and shops were broken into, set on fire, and destroyed, the inhabitants escaping with difficulty and danger. An old woman named Lynch proved that during the course of this raid, just before the burning of her house, her husband (an old man of 75), while standing beside her at their own doorway was shot dead by a soldier in uniform, distant about 10 yards. She made no claim for the murder of her husband. I awarded £414 for the destruction of her home and property.

It is right to add that in this town some of the military and police endeavored to extinguish the flames. There were before me in respect of the raid at Miltown-Malbay 28 claims, and I awarded upward of £45,000.

DIRECTED TO CALL FOR BODY.

A farmer named Daniel Egan applied to me for compensation for the alleged murder of his son. It was proved that a number of men arrested his son and three other men at his residence, on the shores of Lough Derg, bound them with ropes, and carried them away in a boat. The next that the father heard of his son was a telegram from the police informing him that he had been shot on the bridge at Killaloe and directing him to come to Killaloe for the corpse. On going to the police station he found his son's dead body in a coffin. There was a number of military and police present, but the only one he knew was District Inspector Gwynne. I allowed the case to stand for a week for the production of the district inspector. The district inspector did not appear, and I adjourned the case to next sessions.

COMPLAINT OF AUXILIARIES.

Mrs. McDonnell, of Kielty, Tomgranny, claimed compensation for the burning of her house, furniture, and other property on December 3 by the armed forces of the Government. Mrs. Bridget McDonnell, daughter of the applicant, proved the burning of the property and the harsh treatment to which she and her mother and sister had been subjected by the raiders. The house, she swore, had been previously raided and searched on several occasions by auxiliary forces under the command of officers. On the night of the burning she recognized two of the auxiliaries who had been there on previous occasions.

She went to the Lakeside Hotel, Killaloe, after the burning to complain to Col. Andrews, in command of the auxiliaries at their headquarters there. While she was speaking to the colonel she recognized one of the men she had seen at the burning, and requested that the men should be paraded for indentification after having pointed out the man she had recognized. The colonel made no reply, and the men were not paraded.

APPLICATION DISMISSED.

Patrick Fennessy applied for compensation for the burning of hay by men in uniforms. After the burning had been proved Head Constable Hillard deposed that the hay had been burned by a mixed force of police and military, he being in charge of the police on the occasion. In the hay had been found a number of rifles, including one that had been taken from a murdered policeman some time before. There was ammunition in the hay, which exploded during the burning. He directed the hay to be burnt as a precaution. I decided that this was not a criminal injury, and dismissed the application.

JURISDICTION NOT "OUSTED."

In four other cases, after proof of the burning of houses, hay, and other property by the Government forces, military officers attended in court and proved that the houses, etc., had been burned by the military, in two of the cases (applicants O'Gorman and Honan) by the express direction of the officer in command, and in the other two (applicants McCarthy and Moloney) by the verbal authority of the competent military authority. There was no evidence or suggestion that any of the occupants of the houses or the owners of the property had been guilty of any offense. It was argued by Mr. Cullinan, Crown solicitor, that the privy council decision in the case of Marais during the Boer War ousted my jurisdiction. I held after argument that martial law not having then been proclaimed my jurisdiction was not ousted, and that the authority of the military was limited by the restoration of order in Ireland regulations. I held that I had jurisdiction in the cases.

I found on the facts that the burnings were in the nature of reprisals, and I decided that "the ordinary avocations of life and enjoyment of property had been interfered with," and that these burnings were not necessary or at all calculated to secure the maintenance or restoration of law in Ireland.

PEOPLE TREATED WITH VIOLENCE.

On November 1 a raid was made on the village of O'Briens Bridge by the armed forces of the Crown. A large number of the inhabitants, including women and children, were treated with great violence, and their houses, with the contents, burned. There were in all 25 applications in respect of this occurrence, and I awarded compensation to the amount of upward of £13,000.

On November 7 the town of Feakle was similarly invaded by the armed forces of the Government. During the progress of this raid a postman was wounded in the face by gunshot. There were nine applications in respect of this attack, and I awarded compensation to upward of £7,000.

NO CHARGES AGAINST VICTIMS.

A large number of other criminal injuries were committed by Government forces either in continuous raids or isolated cases. The total amount of the awards in cases in which it was proved that Government forces committed the criminal injuries amounted to £187,046 19s. 3d. There were in all 139 cases in which it was proved that the criminal injuries were committed by the armed forces of the Government, and only in the 5 cases already mentioned were any witnesses examined to justify, deny, or explain. In no case was there any evidence to suggest that the victims had been guilty of any offense.

TOO HEAVY FOR RATEPAYERS.

The compensation already awarded in this county in criminal injury claims amounts, I am informed, to well over a quarter of a million. "This constitutes, in my humble judgment, an impossible burden on the ratepayers of the county, many of them already hopelessly impoverished by the loss of their property and means of livelihood, and I would strongly recommend that in the cases in which it is clearly proved that the criminal injuries were committed by the armed forces of the Government the compensation should be paid out of the public treasury."

In addition to the verbatim shorthand report, I also furnish herewith a detailed list of the cases in which I found on the evidence that the criminal injuries were committed by the armed forces of the Crown, acting without lawful authority, showing the amount of compensation awarded in each case.

In conclusion I venture to repeat an opinion expressed at a previous session three months ago that law and order can not be restored or maintained by what I felt constrained to describe as a competition in crime.

M. McDONNELL BODKIN,
County Court Judge for County Clare.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] desires to move the consideration of the conference report on the Army appropriation bill. Knowing how important that measure is, I am perfectly willing to yield the time which I had intended to take to address the Senate on the coal question for the consideration of the conference report. I will therefore ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and to-morrow, after the convening of the Senate, I shall address it on the coal situation if, as I understand from the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], a recess will be moved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. For what purpose?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the consideration of the conference report on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I shall have to object to that. I do not want to be discourteous, but I am going to talk on that report at some length, probably an hour or such a matter, and there are some other Senators whom I do not see in the Chamber now who have, I understand, said that they are going to oppose the conference report. I am not able to do it to-day. I should not object to taking it up even during the morning hour to-morrow. I do not want to delay it, but it will not take any longer to consider it to-morrow than it will to-day. It will not take any more time one day than another, and simply for the reason that I do not feel able to take up that matter now, and because I want to gather together some few things before I start in on it, I shall have to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	McKellar	Stanley
Broussard	Frelinghuysen	McNary	Sutherland
Bursum	Harris	Moses	Townsend
Calder	Harrison	New	Trammell
Capper	Heflin	Norris	Underwood
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Wadsworth
Cummins	Kendrick	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Knox	Sheppard	Warren

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] is absent on account of illness, and that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is necessarily detained on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] are absent on official business of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. GERRY, Mr. KING, Mr. NELSON, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. ODDIE, Mr. SPENCER, and Mr. WILLIS answered to their names when called.

Mr. HALE, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. DIAL, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WATSON of Indiana, Mr. GLASS, Mr. HARRELD, Mr. KEYES, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. JOHNSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

ENFORCED NONPRODUCTION OF COTTON.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I would like to have the Senate take up and consider a matter which surely can not lead to any debate. It relates to the use of funds appropriated in the last agricultural appropriation act for stamping out the pink bollworm.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who objected yesterday to the consideration of the joint resolution, after looking over the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture in relation to the matter, has withdrawn his objection and is perfectly willing to have it passed. It is a pressing matter, one urged by the Secretary of Agriculture, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution, so that the Secretary may avail himself of $200,000 of the amount appropriated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have no objection, if it will not take too long. I understand that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is desirous of bringing up the conference report on the military appropriation bill to-morrow and wants to make a suggestion regarding it. If this is going to lead to extended debate——

Mr. SMITH. It can not; there is nothing to debate. The question is whether we shall grant the authority or not.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have no objection.

Mr. MOSES. What is the number of the resolution?

Mr. SMITH. It is Senate joint resolution 72, introduced as a result of a request from the Secretary of Agriculture that he be allowed to use $200,000 of the $400,000 that was appropriated for stopping the ravages of the pink bollworm. The letter of the Secretary was printed in the RECORD at the request of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who has read the letter and is satisfied that the Secretary of Agriculture is correct.

Mr. MOSES. He asks authority to transfer money appropriated for one purpose to another?

Mr. SMITH. No; it merely grants him authority to use the amount named in a method different from that prescribed in the law; and the Secretary sets forth his reasons in the letter to the Senator from Nebraska. The money is already appropriated. It does not add a penny and establishes no precedent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) for the relief of States in the cotton belt that have given aid to cotton farmers forced from the fields in established nonproduction zones through efforts to eradicate the pink bollworm, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That when any State shall have enacted legislation and taken measures, including the establishment and enforcement of noncotton zones, adequate, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, to eradicate the pink bollworm in any area thereof actually infested or threatened by such pest, the said Secretary, under regulations to be prescribed by him, is authorized, out of the appropriation of $554,840 for "Eradication of pink bollworm" made by the Agricultural appropriation act of March 3, 1921, to utilize not to exceed $200,000, available until expended, in reimbursing such States for expenses incurred by them in compensating any farmer for his loss due to the enforced nonproduction of cotton within said zones: Provided, That such reimbursement of any State shall be based upon the fair rental value of said land; that such reimbursement shall not exceed one-third the amount actually paid by the State to any farmer, and in no event shall exceed $5 per acre; and that no reimbursement shall be made in respect of any farmer who has not complied in good faith with all quarantine and control regulations prescribed by said Secretary of Agriculture and such State relative to the pink bollworm.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement at this time. At the earnest request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who has delivered a rather long address, and who desires to be heard upon the conference report on the Army appropriation bill, I shall not press that report for consideration this afternoon; but it is my duty, Mr. President, to press for its consideration to-morrow, for various reasons. There are certain legislative provisions in the Army appropriation bill which, as soon as they become law, will operate to save the Government thousands and thousands of dollars, which will continue to be spent by the Government until the bill becomes a law. As soon as the Senate reconvenes to-morrow I intend to ask unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business and present the conference report, and I expect to urge the Senate to accept the House amendment and close the entire incident.

CAPT. EDMUND G. CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 70, this day reported unanimously from the Naval Affairs Committee. If it leads to any discussion, I will withdraw it.

There being no objection, the resolution, which had been submitted May 7, 1921, by Mr. SHEPPARD, was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs is authorized and directed to investigate the facts leading to the court-martial as well as the court-martial proceedings and all the findings in the case of former Capt. Edmund G. Chamberlain, United States Marine Corps, and report to Congress.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 22, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate June 21, 1921.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 21, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. WALSH as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O merciful God, Thou hast said they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength. We approach Thee with all of our needs and without self-defense. May our chief delight be in the law of the Lord; and then bring to all of our hearts the memories, the hopes, and the joys of Thy loving presence. Enable us this day to do our little best, and then whisper the sweet resignation, namely, "Even so, Father, so it seemeth good in Thy sight." We beseech Thee to direct with great wisdom the executive, the legislative, and the judicial branches of our Government. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LABOR SHORTAGE IN HAWAII—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution 158, introduced by the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE], providing an emergency remedy for the acute labor shortage in the Territory of Hawaii, may be rereferred from the Committee on the Territories to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent for the rereference of House joint resolution 158, which provides for the admission into the Territory of Hawaii of aliens otherwise inadmissible, as the Secretary of Labor may deem necessary to meet the emergency existing in the shortage of agricultural labor. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman if he takes this action by authority of the committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do, and I will say that I think the reference to the Committee on the Territories came about from the fact that various memorials of the Territorial Legislature of Hawaii addressed to Congress were referred, properly as regards most of the memorials, to the Committee on the Territories, but the Immigration Committee believes it has jurisdiction of this joint resolution. Therefore I ask the unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman consulted with the chairman of the Committee on the Territories and with the ranking Democratic member of that committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, and in the absence of the ranking Democratic member I have consulted with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD], who is a member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the rereference of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House private pension bills and bills relating to pension legislation are in order for consideration to-day.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5214) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and, pending that, I would like to ask if we can make some arrangement as to the time for general debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5214.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is inconsistent with the order of the House yesterday that unfinished business on the Unanimous Consent Calendar should be in order this morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order of yesterday was that business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent unobjected to should be taken up for consideration to-day at the conclusion of the business in order to-day, so when the pension business is concluded we will return to the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the point.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, can we make some arrangement about time for general debate? I suggest one hour.

Mr. ROGERS. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman be able to give me 15 minutes of the hour?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There is a request on this side for 20 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Can the gentleman from Tennessee give 10 minutes of his 30 to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS]?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes. We have a request for only 20 minutes. I can give the gentleman from Massachusetts 10 minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate terminate in one hour, one half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that debate close in one hour, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL] and one-half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. KNUTSON was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill H. R. 5214.

The bill is as follows:

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I picked up a copy of last night's Star and in it I found that the Democratic national committee has begun its campaign of vituperation. One of the things said in the first article issued by that committee is this:

> The Republican Party in the last campaign promised to reduce Federal taxes. A Republican Congress has increased them, the appropriation bills carrying $6,000,000,000 for 1921 and a like amount for 1922 (which would be $7,500,000,000 by the addition of bonuses). This means that this administration will spend three times as much on an Army in 1921 as it spent in 1916, and more than three times as much on the Navy in 1921 as it spent in 1916, when nearly all of Europe was at war.

To nail the first misstatement, I wish to say that the appropriations made for 1921 amounted to $4,780,829,510.35. Of this sum $186,492,383.45 was for deficiencies for the fiscal year 1920 and prior years, with the conduct of the business of which the Republicans had nothing whatever to do.

It also included $800,000,000 on account of governmental management of railroads with which the Republicans had nothing whatever to do. Five hundred millions of this was on account of the Federal control and $300,000,000 for new loans to the carriers. So that it will be seen at the outset that the appropriations for 1921, leaving out the extraordinary obligations created prior to the induction of the Republicans either into the control of Congress or the administrative side of the Government, were $3,794,337,126.90 instead of $6,000,000,000, a difference of $2,205,662,873.10 between the statement printed by the Democratic national committee and the actual fact.

Now, what is the fact as to 1922? The total appropriations for 1922 amount to $3,538,206,618.57, and are as follows:

Agricultural	$36, 404, 259. 00
Diplomatic and Consular	9, 326, 550. 79
District of Columbia	19, 412, 412. 99
Fortification	8, 038, 017. 00
Indian	9, 761, 554. 67
Legislative, executive, and judicial	110, 345, 018. 75
Pension	265, 500, 000. 00
Post Office	574, 057, 552. 00
River and harbor	15, 250, 000. 00
Sundry civil	384, 196, 760. 41
Total, regular measures enacted	1, 432, 292, 125. 61
REGULAR ANNUAL APPROPRIATION ACTS STILL PENDING.
Naval (in the amount as passed by the House)	396, 001, 249. 23
Army (in the amount as agreed upon in conference and counting pay of enlisted men—still in dispute—at the House figures)	322, 950, 818. 80
Total, regular measures enacted and pending	2, 151, 244, 193. 64
PERMANENT AND INDEFINITE APPROPRIATIONS.
Interest on the public debt	$922, 650, 000. 00
Sinking fund	265, 754, 864. 87
Construction of roads	1, 000, 000. 00
Customs service, repayments, etc	27, 000, 000. 00
Indian funds and interest on Indian funds	23, 475, 000. 00
Miscellaneous items	60, 896, 496. 00
Increased compensation ($240 bonus)	35, 000, 000. 00
Total, permanents and indefinites	1, 335, 776, 360. 87
Appropriations carried in miscellaneous appropriation and other acts	20, 897, 018. 02
Miscellaneous appropriations for 1922 in deficiency act approved June 16, 1921	30, 289, 046. 04
Grand total	3, 538, 206, 618. 57

Making a total of $3,538,206,618. There is quite a difference between that and $6,000,000,000—a difference of $2,500,000,000.

These figures do not include the $351,000,000 of deficiencies appropriated for in the last two deficiency bills. These deficiencies have nothing whatever to do with the appropriations for 1922. They had little or anything to do with the activities of 1921; they were obligations created before by the preceding administration.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will recall that the last deficiency bill just passed carried something over $30,000,000——

Mr. MADDEN. I have included that $30,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Has the gentleman figured up how much reappropriations have been made in the various bills?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I have not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that every bill that we have passed has made reappropriations. Take the sundry civil bill—one item alone, the Shipping Board—no one can say how much has been appropriated.

Mr. MADDEN. Twenty-five million dollars.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That was a direct appropriation, but the bill carried authority to use——

Mr. MADDEN. Use money from the sale of ships; but they are not selling any ships and are not likely to and there will be no appropriation.

It has been charged by the Democrats that we have been spending money at the rate of $6,000,000,000 a year. Everybody knows that expenditures have nothing to do with the state of appropriations. It can well be that appropriations would not exceed $3,000,000,000 in a given year, and yet the expenditures might be $6,000,000,000. Why? There are obligations pending against appropriations made in past years which are still available, in connection with which expenditures must be made. The mere fact that expenditures are being made is no indication whatever that the obligation that is levied against the people by whom the tax must be paid is new. The things against which a tax must be levied are the obligations created in the appropriation bills; that is, the expenses for the year with which we deal. It may be that for 10 years gone by bills unsettled have been pending, the appropriations for which are still available, and when adjudicated and the accounting is made the Secretary of the Treasury draws his draft to meet the obligation.

Mr. MAGEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MAGEE. Does the gentleman contend that the total probable expenditures for 1922 will exceed $4,000,000,000?

Mr. MADDEN. I said $3,538,000,000, and if there is to be adjusted compensation allowed for soldiers, of course, it would add whatever that amounts to. What it will amount to I do not know. It probably would amount in total to $1,500,000,000 or $500,000,000 a year for three years.

In the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury a short time since to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee he indicated that the payments through the Treasury during the last year amounted to $5,600,000,000; and also indicated that the probable payments to be made during the year 1922 would be $4,014,000,000, but in his calculation he estimated that there would be necessarily under the appropriations to be made by Congress an expenditure of $1,100,000,000 for the Army and the Navy.

The fact is, however, that the Army and Navy appropriations combined for 1922 will not exceed $700,000,000; so that there we have a saving of $400,000,000 in the estimated payments to be made through the Treasury Department. My own judgment is that we will not need to raise by internal revenue taxation more than $2,500,000,000. It has been said by many that we would have to raise $4,000,000,000. I believe that the estimated miscellaneous receipts from the Government average about $500,000,000 a year, and it is estimated that we will receive from the customs revenue under the new tariff act $500,000,000.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman repeat that statement?

Mr. MADDEN. It is estimated we will receive $500,000,000 under the new tariff act.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Under which new tariff act?

Mr. MADDEN. Under the tariff act that is being considered and which will be reported for the consideration of the gentleman and others in a very few days.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. On what is that estimate based?

Mr. MADDEN. That estimate is based on figures supplied by the Treasury Department to those who are giving consideration to the tariff bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean that the schedules have been so prepared in that committee now that it may be reasonably estimated that it will raise that amount of money?

Mr. MADDEN. From the best information I have it will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Or is that what they are trying to raise?

Mr. MADDEN. That is what they are trying to raise and it is beyond question that that is what they will raise. That makes $3,500,000,000, and we will receive from postal revenues not less than $500,000,000.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MADDEN. In a moment. That would then show that we would have by virtue of the proposition of $2,500,000,000 income tax and the other revenues I have indicated a prospective revenue of $4,000,000,000, and with appropriations not exceeding $3,500,000,000, with possible payments, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, of not to exceed $4,014,000,000, I see no reason why we ought not to be able in the new revenue act when it comes up for consideration to take off the excess-profits tax, the high bracket of income taxes, the railroad freight and passenger tax, which amounts to $300,000,000 a year, and all of the obnoxious soda water fountain taxes and things of that sort and substitute for them nothing but economy. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he stated that we would probably receive $500,000,000 this fiscal year from the postal revenues—or is it for the fiscal year 1922?

Mr. MADDEN. I am talking about 1922.

Mr. BLACK. If I recall correctly the appropriations to the Postal Service, the expenses will be about $574,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. $574,000,000 is what they were.

Mr. BLACK. Then that will leave a deficit.

Mr. MADDEN. I assumed when we framed the appropriation bill, and so stated on the floor, that if the revenues from the Postal Service maintained the standard which existed then we would receive about $525,000,000.

Mr. BLACK. Then it is true that we are confronted with a deficit in the Postal Service that will very likely approach $75,000,000. The question I wanted to ask is this: I understand that there is a proposition under way to repeal the zone postal raise which takes place on July 1. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he believes, in view of a $75,000,000 deficit in the Postal Service, that we ought to relieve the big publishers from the increased rate that takes place on July 1?

Mr. MADDEN. When the legislation to which the gentleman refers comes to the House for consideration I shall be then glad to give him my opinion about it.

Mr. GARNER. Why can the gentleman not give it now?

Mr. BLACK. I thought the gentleman might give it at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know what the legislation is, and until I can give it some consideration I have no opinion to offer upon it. I wish to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] that while it has been definitely understood that the revenues from the Postal Service would not be sufficient in 1922 to meet the appropriations, it is also fairly well understood that the continued increase in these revenues will more than offset in 1923 any deficiency that might exist in 1922, and while it was said by the outgoing administration, by the Postmaster General in his various reports—and, by the way, I wish to record my very earnest friendship for the Postmaster General of past years, and I have no criticism to make of him, for he did the best he could—that there was a surplus until the final year of his administration, when he said there was a deficit of $17,000,000 and odd, yet when the actual facts were disclosed, as we were able to disclose them, they showed that for the period of his administration there was a deficit not of $17,000,000 but of $105,000,000, for which he and his assistants came to the Committee on Appropriations and obtained deficiency appropriations.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not complaining, but am just stating the facts. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman further explain that that deficit was occasioned by a decision on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission which raised the rates for carrying the mail 35 per cent?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, that is true; but the gentleman from Texas will also admit, I am sure, that until that decision was rendered the Post Office Department was not paying anything like what it ought to pay for the work that is done by the railroads in the transportation of the mail.

Mr. BLACK. I am not complaining of the decision of the commission, but I just wanted to get the facts before the House.

Mr. MADDEN. I agree that the time has come for the most rigid system of economy in Government, and for one I propose to exercise every influence and power that I have to put that system into effect. The people of the United States are demanding economy; they are demanding a reduction in taxes; and to the extent that it is possible to give it to them they ought to have it, but it must be realized by everyone who wants to be fair that this administration inherited a legacy of obligations that it must meet. The railroad companies were controlled by the Government of the United States for a period of 26 months, and during that period that control cost the American people $4,006,000,000.

Some people say it did not cost that much; other people say we do not know how much it cost. I have made many calculations on the cost, and my figures show $4,006,000,000. That is more than it cost to run the Government for every activity during the same period of time before we went into the war. And there never was a time when the railroads did not function before they were taken over by the Government. They could have functioned better if they never had been taken over, and we would not have had this enormous charge against the people.

We all realize that the business conditions of the country are not very good. The industrial side of American life is very much depressed. Men are out of work. The agricultural sections of the country are not as prosperous as they might be, and every element of our citizenship is looking forward with hope to a change in conditions. But until we find a lower level in cost, in wages and material and supplies of all kinds, that enter into the life of the Nation we are not going to be able to realize the benefits that we are hoping for and looking forward to. But the time is coming when everybody must realize that the war is over and that peace conditions must prevail and that expenditures of government must be in keeping with the economies necessary by the average man outside of the Government. We have a great responsibility placed upon us. We ought to meet it with courage and fidelity. We will not shrink from this responsibility, but in the performance of our duty under the responsibility we should never hesitate to do that which will bring the greatest economy in government and the greatest happiness and prosperity to the homes of the land. I have no fear but that we will meet the conditions that confront us and meet them to the satisfaction of the people. And when the revenue act is passed—and I wish it had been one of the first things done—I believe the people of the country will realize that we have been forward-looking; that we have had the vision necessary to see their needs; and that we have had the patriotism to do what should be done to bring about the stabilization of all activities and bring back peace and comfort and employment and prosperity and happiness to every home.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I have heard it stated that the payment of income tax for the quarter that is now about ended will amount only to about one-fourth of what it did for a similar period last year. Now, if that is true, will we not have to be very careful in reducing the amount of income tax? I wanted to have the gentleman's opinion as to whether or not there was any truth in that statement.

Mr. MADDEN. Of the excess-profits tax, I wish to say to my colleague, in 1919, if I recall, there was collected a little over $3,000,000,000. In 1920, if I recall, it fell to a billion and three and some odd millions. It is estimated now under the present excess-profits tax it will not yield more than $450,000,000. Now that is, of course, due to the depression in business, due to the fact that people who are engaged in business are not making war profits any more. But all these things will be taken into consideration in the legislation that is to be enacted. It is foreseen that if the excess-profits tax continues it will finally get to a point where no money whatever will be raised from that source. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman on the other side use some of his time?

Mr. DEAL. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think the following communication from Mr. William H. Anderson, State superintendent of the Antisaloon League of New York, should be made public. It reads as follows:

["The church in action against the saloon." The Antisaloon League of New York, William H. Anderson, State superintendent, sixteenth floor, 906 Broadway, northeast corner Twentieth Street, New York City.]

MR. DINWIDDIE'S BETRAYAL OF PROHIBITION—A STATEMENT BY WILLIAM H. ANDERSON, A MEMBER OF THE NATIONAL EXECUTIVE AND LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE OF THE ANTISALOON LEAGUE OF AMERICA.

As superintendent of the antisaloon league of the largest State, the center of nullification activity in America, whose liquor interests have just been given aid and comfort as per advance information in our possession, by Rev. Edwin C. Dinwiddie, once national legislative superintendent of the league, it becomes my unpleasant duty to protect the cause by giving the public some facts respecting him, in order that his present attitude may be properly appraised. Since the prominence given his hostility to the dry program is due mainly to the fact he was once connected with the antisaloon league the reason why he is no longer with it becomes pertinent.

That Mr. Dinwiddie has much ability in certain directions and in the past has performed much valuable service while acting for the antisaloon league is admitted. He has also received large credit for victories that came because of the aggressiveness of league men throughout the country, who were willing to be unpopular in order to advance the cause, while allowing Mr. Dinwiddie to pose at Washington as a diplomat, disparaging work of a sort he could neither do nor comprehend, but which was responsible for much of the constructive achievement in his department.

One of the reasons why many league workers were glad when Mr. Wheeler was sent to Washington was because of a growing feeling that it was not safe longer to trust legislative interests and the administration of its policies entirely to Mr. Dinwiddie. Nearly three years ago, during the handling of a situation due to his resentment over this and the exercise of necessary control by the responsible league committee, I told him frankly in the presence of the national executive committee that there was a feeling in many quarters among league workers that he was not playing the game, but looking out for and trying to serve himself first, and advance the cause of prohibition and the league as its exponent, which employed him, second. He announced he would have much to say in reply, but he never said it openly.

Some two years ago, on the basis of definite information, I confronted Mr. Dinwiddie before the league national executive committee with the proposition that he was seeking to be appointed Federal prohibition commissioner under the proposed pending enforcement measure, precisely as the wets were charging in an effort to discredit the sincerity of the league and obstruct enforcement legislation. He could not and did not deny it. This led to the reaffirmation by the national executive committee, national board of directors, and national convention of the league's policy of opposing the appointment of any salaried league staff worker to any position created by any legislation promoted by the league. Notwithstanding this action he persisted in his efforts and was opposed by sincere prohibitionists for the additional reason that he was not adapted for that kind of work and his failure would discredit prohibition, and he was not appointed.

By this time Mr. Dinwiddie's position with the league was absolutely untenable, but because of past services there was no disposition to crowd him. In this sense his statement yesterday that he resigned voluntarily is true. When he did resign over a year ago, his resignation, by its suggestion in substance that the need for such work was over, apparently an effort to save his face and satisfy his grudges by giving the impression that he was dropping the league, was calculated to increase the difficulty of the prohibition work which he evidently thought he was leaving. The national committee in accepting his resignation repudiated his gratuitous dictum while acknowledging the numerous good things he had done. Now he is back in the prohibition fight as a de facto ally of the wets, opposing strengthening enforcement amendments which experience has proved necessary, and favoring the proposal, covered in a bill introduced by the same Congressman who is leading in the fight to repeal the whole Federal enforcement law, to turn prohibition matters entirely over to the Department of Justice. And, if it becomes pertinent, I have the facts to show that these are not the only instances where he has tried to sacrifice the cause of prohibition for his own supposed personal advantage.

Mr. Dinwiddie's defection is not a "split" as jubilantly claimed by the wets. It is only a splinter. The two great nationally recognized prohibition agencies, the Women's Christian Temperance Union and the Anti-Saloon League, are solidly against his liquor-assisting proposals, as are the temperance agencies of the largest denominations. Mr. Dinwiddie represents: (1) A purely paper organization that is supposed to head up in New York; (2) a national reform association which, whatever it stands for and whoever is back of it, has no standing as a material constructive factor in either securing or protecting prohibition; (3) the Good Templars, a small but splendid group with an honorable history, who would undoubtedly repudiate his present attitude if he dared risk a complete personal membership referendum based on briefs prepared by himself and Mr. Wheeler, accompanied by this statement.

The real danger lay in the fact that Mr. Dinwiddie's opposition to what is desired by the churches generally, unless discounted by publication of the facts, might have been used as an excuse for voting to delay or defeat action, by conservative, timid, or shifty Congressmen who come from districts where public sentiment demands prompt, thorough action, and who would have to vote right unless furnished a pretext in the form of a so-called "split" on the dry side. Since, whatever his motive, this was plainly Mr. Dinwiddie's purpose, the public has a right to the protection involved in knowledge of the facts. Those opposed to allowing honest enforcement to be blocked by timid or selfish business interests, with some that are lawless and which could well afford liberally to finance some kinds of so-called "true prohibition" work, need only to close ranks and fight harder to frustrate this surprising attempt at a flank attack, timed for delivery at a supposedly critical moment.

WILLIAM H. ANDERSON,
State Superintendent Anti-Saloon League of New York.

Mr. Chairman, we are told that unless a supplemental measure is passed within a few days, which has been prepared by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and known as the Volstead Supplementary Act, the brewers over the country who have already gone out of business—I am speaking of the ones that have gone out; some of them have not, but I am speaking of the ones that have gone out of business, who have resigned themselves to the inevitable, who have realized that the people of the United States of America are done with the liquor business—unless this measure passes, are going to open up again their breweries and will be in full blast in a few days. I think that kind of an emergency ought to bring out that legislation, and I do not think——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman know what kind of legislation he is talking about just now?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will he describe the bill that he thinks ought to be brought out and tell what it contains?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will give me sufficient time, I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman is speaking out of order, and I think he ought to be permitted to tell what he knows about the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want the chairman of the Rules Committee, who could bring out this bill to-day if he wanted to, to take up my time trying to excuse himself for not bringing it out.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not doing it. I would if I alone could do it.

Mr. BLANTON. They could bring it out if they wanted to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But they do not want to. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. That is what is the matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And they will not.

Mr. BLANTON. And I am glad that the prohibition—dry—element of this country knows why it is not coming out, and they will put the blame accordingly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, will the gentleman tell what is in the bill that he thinks ought to come out?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield just now. The gentleman from Kansas has stopped other measures from coming before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell the gentleman what is in that bill. If he will bring that bill here under special rule and let us pass it, as desired by Mr. VOLSTEAD and the dry forces of this country, we will stop the manufacture of beer designated for medicinal purposes, but really designed for beverage purposes, and to be sold under the guise of medicine. That is what we will do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is not the only thing you will do.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has stopped other legislation. I admit that. Why, the great Judiciary Committee of this House once reported out a measure unanimously to stop sedition in this country, and the bill went to the Committee on Rules, and the report was given out that our good friend from Kansas, the genial chairman of the Committee on Rules, whom I like, was going to report a rule out at once for its passage, and when it went into the press the next morning the press told us that Mr. Gompers had sent instructions to that committee that he must have a hearing before the rule was passed and that he was not going to let it come out. And he did not let it come out. He went in there with his big attorney, Mr. Ralston, and had hearings for several days, and when he got through the bill was as dead as Hector.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the Rules Committee can kill legislation when it wants to. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It did a good job that day.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. KNUTSON. And I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, we hear a good deal in the House concerning the needs of the disabled soldiers and the problems which attend their care, and the righteousness of action by the Congress and by the people to help their lot as much as is possible. Of course, we are all in sympathy with those statements. Of course, we are all anxious to convert them, if we can, into something more practical than language. In my time to-day I want to discuss with the House and present to the House a matter as to which I think we can be of practical use and helpfulness to the disabled soldiers.

I have on the blackboard here a map of Walter Reed Hospital. I am sorry it is not larger and more distinct, but perhaps it will enable the members of the committee more clearly to grasp the points that I want to make. Along the east side of the hospital reservation is Georgia Avenue. To the west is Sixteenth Street, which becomes Alaska Avenue, turning toward the northeast. Fern Street is on the north. To the south the country is largely an undeveloped, sparsely settled region. The original Walter Reed Hospital site ran to the west from Georgia Avenue, with the big brick administration building at about the center of the area as then constituted.

That was the situation when we entered into the war. In 1917 it was seen that we should need to expand the buildings tremendously. So early in 1918 we purchased the tract running all the way over to Sixteenth Street and made that an integral part of the Walter Reed property. At about the same time we added certain triangles to the north.

Two years ago Congress made up its mind that it was to make permanent at the Walter Reed Hospital a great military medical establishment, not merely a hospital site, but a great medical center for the United States Government and the United States Army; and in the Army appropriation act approved July 11, 1919, we appropriated $350,000 for the purchase of land contiguous to Walter Reed Hospital, of about 27 acres in area, for the final location of the Army Medical Museum, the Surgeon General's Library, and the Army Medical School, and for the improvements on the land to be purchased. This provision was expanded somewhat by an amendment to the Army appropriation act approved on the 28th of February of last year.

The property just mentioned is the property to the north of the former site, comprising about 27 acres, and bounded on the north by Fern Street, on the east by Georgia Avenue, and on the northwest by Alaska Avenue. Fourteenth Street, at present, stops about a mile and two-tenths south of the southern line of the Walter Reed Hospital reservation. The intervening country, as many Members of the House will recall, is largely made up of unimproved property, covered with underbrush, with a series of ravines traversing it, and with very few houses anywhere upon it.

This yellow line on the map is the line of Fourteenth Street prolonged. When thus prolonged it passes through the midst of the hospital reservation. The region I am indicating to the south is outside the Walter Reed Reservation, and is in general of the character I have indicated. Fourteenth Street has never been opened through the Walter Reed Hospital site. There has never been a Fourteenth Street on any part of the original Walter Reed property. But up here in the new part in the north, which was purchased under the authority of Congress two years ago, there is a Fourteenth Street, in prolongation of the line of Fourteenth Street, though separated from it by nearly 2 miles. Within a very recent time the proposal has been made to extend Fourteenth Street north from where it stops near Brightwood, right through the Walter Reed Hospital grounds, to make it one of the main arteries of travel out from Washington; to lay street car tracks upon it; and ultimately to create a rival boulevard parallel to Sixteenth Street, two blocks away.

It is that proposal, in so far as it involves cutting Walter Reed Hospital in two, against which I want to protest emphatically to-day. I hope that I can convince Members of the House who have not already considered the matter that it would be criminal for us to authorize or tolerate the extension of Fourteenth Street through the Walter Reed Hospital grounds. We all know the volume of travel on Sixteenth Street and similar highways on a Sunday afternoon, and on almost any pleasant afternoon in the summer, when the motor cars are so numerous. A Fourteenth Street boulevard would be the counterpart. When you think that this hospital is dedicated to disabled soldier patients, many of them crippled, many of them dependent on wheel chairs, to my mind it is a shocking proposal that we shall run a great boulevard through the midst of those hospital grounds to the peril of every disabled soldier who is there. This hospital property to the west, between Fourteenth and Sixteenth Streets, is largely wooded property. It is perhaps the most desirable part of the entire reservation, both because of the lay of the land and because of the presence of the trees which lend themselves to attractive development both for the soldiers' quarters and for the large buildings that are to be erected there under the recent authority of Congress. The project would cut this off from the rest of the reservation by a heavily traveled boulevard.

To separate the two halves of the hospital by a great artery of through travel to and from Washington, with street cars upon it, to my mind is one of the most outrageous things that we can conceive.

It is proposed as an alternative that Fourteenth Street shall be depressed; that is, that it shall run in a cut as it goes through the Walter Reed Hospital grounds. I do not know whether it is practicable to run a cut for that distance without prohibitive cost. To put the street on a lower level would perhaps remove some of the danger to the patients, but the noise of motors and street cars and the stench from the gasoline fumes coming out of the cut would materially affect and impair the value of that property to the soldiers. We establish everywhere "Zones of quiet" near hospitals. This project is to establish a "zone of noise." Walter Reed should be a great soldiers' park system, and I can not for the life of me understand how in the world it can be seriously proposed that it should be bisected by a motor and trolly thoroughfare.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. How would such a street be opened? Would the consent of Congress have to be obtained first, or is there power in the commissioners of the District to institute proceedings for its opening?

Mr. ROGERS. I am coming to that. I am glad to answer the gentleman's question. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes left.

Mr. ROGERS. As I understand the situation there is a highway commission made up of the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers, and the Secretary of the Interior. That highway commission takes cognizance of these cases in the first instance. It is to give a public hearing in the District Building on Thursday on this very question. I understand that that commission has not the power to open Fourteenth Street. It never has been opened through the original hospital area and there is no power in the commission to open it. That commission can only recommend to Congress. I am speaking of the matter at this time, perhaps prematurely, because I want to stop this movement before it gets a real start.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Committee on Military Affairs this morning ordered a bill reported prohibiting the opening of this street and ordering it closed.

Mr. ROGERS. I am very glad to hear that. I discussed the matter yesterday with the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee and knew that he shared my view on the subject of the opening of Fourteenth Street. On the other hand, I know that there are exceedingly powerful interests behind the project to open Fourteenth Street. I do not know who or what those interests are, but the War Department has stated positively that very powerful pressure from very influential interests was being brought to bear. I, therefore, thought it wise to bring this matter to the attention of the House early, before men who had not understood the situation might get committed the wrong way on this question.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I was wondering if the gentleman could tell us who would seriously propose opening a street through Walter Reed Hospital?

Mr. ROGERS. There is a bill before the House now to authorize the opening of Fourteenth Street. That bill was introduced, as it states on its face, by request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. I hope that statement on the bill itself conveys the implication that the introducer of it is at least doubtful of its propriety; but the fact that the bill is officially proposed and apparently sponsored by the city government of the District of Columbia gives it a certain importance, and I think a danger, as to which the House ought promptly to be warned.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The newspapers of the city are carrying notices of meetings and of action by civic associations which are demanding the opening of the street through the hospital grounds, giving as a reason the great distance between Sixteenth Street and Georgia Avenue, and stating that it is inconvenient and undesirable from all standpoints according to them that there is no street between Sixteenth Street and Georgia Avenue. So there is a demand for it and a strenuous effort made to bring it about; that is, to put through Fourteenth Street.

Mr. MADDEN. If the hospital was not there, it would be justifiable to open Fourteenth Street, but with the hospital there it is not.

Mr. ROGERS. That is true. Of course, no one wants to impair or impede the proper development of a great section of the city. There is no impropriety in opening Fourteenth Street as far north as the hospital grounds. It is a mile and two-tenths from the present end of Fourteenth Street up to that point. I think it would be an excellent thing to open Fourteenth Street up to the southern boundary of the hospital area. That is certain to come within a few years. The street car line may also come in time. But there is no earthly reason why either the street or the street cars should ever run through the hospital grounds. The line can be diverted to Sixteenth Street, which is two blocks to the left, or to Georgia Avenue, which is two blocks to the right. That would serve the hospital fully. It would afford a new means of ingress to Rock Creek Park. It would permit an extension to the north, which would gradually serve any suburban development that may later come as the city develops to the north.

If a great trolley and motor highway cuts through the midst of the Walter Reed Hospital grounds it will be a constant menace to the life and limb of every one of the hundreds of disabled veterans who are or are to be patients at the hospital in the years to come. Even if it should run on a lower level, the noise and the gasoline fumes would seriously militate against the health and happiness of the men, especially the numerous cases suffering from mental or nervous disorders. Furthermore, either solution would prevent for all time the beautiful park development of the Walter Reed area, which Congress has deliberately decided to make a reality. If there were any real reason for cutting these hospital grounds in two, possibly the foregoing arguments, although they seem to me conclusive, might have to be reconsidered. But, as I have shown, the fact is that the trolley and motor highway can run to the southern edge of the hospital property and then deflect two blocks either to the west or east and thence run north as far as desired upon existing highways outside the hospital limits. I hope that the Members of the House will bear in mind this extraordinary proposal and will use their efforts to stop the insidious movement before it gets a fair start. [Applause.]

Under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I print a memorandum prepared for me by Col. Glennan, the commanding officer of the hospital:

WALTER REED GENERAL HOSPITAL,
Washington, D. C. June 20, 1921.

Memorandum on the proposal to open Fourteenth Street through the Walter Reed Reservation.

An appropriation was made by Congress for the purchase of additional land for the Walter Reed Hospital for the purpose of enlarging the permanent hospital, building the Army Medical School, library, and museum, and making a medical training center.

The larger part of the land has been purchased, only those lots which require condemnation being now in the courts.

The streets in this new section to the north had been dedicated to the District of Columbia. The cross streets are unimportant. The only street under discussion is Fourteenth Street, the upper portion of which was dedicated to the District of Columbia, the lower portion being the property of the United States.

House bill 5824, introduced by Mr. KAHN, provides for closing the dedicated streets so that the land may be used as desired by the Government. House bill 5579, introduced by Mr. FOCHT, provides for opening the southern portion of Fourteenth Street, now belonging to the Government, for street traffic and for the Fourteenth Street railroad line, which now ends about 1.2 miles south of the hospital.

The various propositions which have been discussed are as follows:

1. Opening Fourteenth Street through the reservation for surface street and railroad traffic.

This section would be ruinous to the hospital and contrary to all the plans which have been made a study for several years and which were implied in the action of Congress. It is desired to make a parklike reservation where sick and wounded soldiers will be able to go about in chairs and on crutches with safety and in the zone of quiet which is as essential to the hospital and to the schools it is proposed to establish.

2. It has been proposed to lower the grade of Fourteenth Street, with bridges where crossings are desired. This method is about as bad as the first one. It will divide the reservation, and the noise will be as great as in the first method. Both methods also interfere with the plan of the architecture for the development of the medical center.

3. It has been proposed to turn the car line west to Sixteenth Street south of the reservation, run up in the parking on the east side of Sixteenth Street and Alaska Avenue to Fourteenth Street.

It is less objectionable than going through the reservation, but makes a dangerous crossing at the entrance to the hospital and at Alaska Avenue.

4. It has been proposed to bring the car line west, south of the reservation, run under Sixteenth Street at a point where there is now a natural ravine, run north on the side of Rock Creek Park to some point where an exit may be made.

This method is the least objectionable to the hospital, would give an opportunity for a park entrance, and would not seem objectionable, as one way to Rock Creek Park.

5. It has also been proposed to turn the car line east, south of the reservation, to Georgia Avenue and use the present Georgia Avenue tracks to any part desired; as a variation or addition to this method to turn a small loop west to Sixteenth Street and have a park station at the east side of Sixteenth Street.

Either the fourth or fifth methods would be best for the hospital. Fourteenth Street and Sixteenth Street are so near together that ordinary motor traffic would usually go on Sixteenth Street. The car line is practically the only part under discussion.

J. D. GLENNAN,
Colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army, Commanding.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any other gentleman desire recognition?

Mr. DEAL. We have no one else who wishes to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Julia M. Porter, widow of Clinton A. Porter, late of Company F, First Regiment New Hampshire Infantry, War with Spain, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, on page 2, line 4, after the word "month," I desire to offer an amendment to insert the words "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KNUTSON: Page 2, line 4, after the word "month," insert "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Christina Stenger, widow of Ferdinand Stenger, late of Troop K, Third Regiment United States Cavalry, Indian wars, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Page 6, line 2, after the word "month," insert "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 2, after the word "month," insert the words "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Simpson Hornaday, late of Company H, Sixth Regiment, and Troop B, Seventh Regiment, United States Cavalry, Indian wars, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving, to include special pension of $10, medal of honor roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed out of order for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that he may proceed out of order for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to comment for a few moments on the speech made on this floor by the distinguished gentleman from New York, the Hon. BOURKE COCKRAN, a week or 10 days ago, in relation to the power of oratory in the House of Representatives in by-gone days, the strength of the House now, and the rules of the House.

I presume, Mr. Chairman, that many an American schoolboy, if asked to define the function of the Roman Senate, would be tempted to reply that the institution existed for the purpose of listening to the speeches of Cicero. Perhaps that is what Cicero himself thought. It is a far cry from the Rome of 2,000 years ago to the United States of America of the present, but those who listened to the eloquent burst of oratory from the lips of the gentleman from New York, the Hon. BOURKE COCKRAN, in the House recently—June 11, pages 2439 to 2441 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—could but gather that, in the speaker's opinion, the House of Representatives should exist, primarily, for the purpose of enabling youthful orators to burst into fame.

In his eloquent way the gentleman from New York made a comparison between the House of to-day and the House of previous years that had a rather bitter tinge of pessimism.

The House had declined in importance, he said, during the last 20 years, and he attributed its decline to the fact that the Members limited their powers by means of abject rules which were designed for the purpose of expediting business instead of letting the eagles of oratory soar at will through the wide stretches of the empyrean. He told us how, in other days, Henry Clay and James G. Blaine and William Jennings Bryan established their reputations upon the floor of the House, how the wealthiest business men, the most astute journalists, and the greatest lawyers burned with desire to leave their businesses and professions behind them and get into Congress, and how the whole country sat spellbound under the sway of their eloquence.

"But it's all over now," sighed Mr. COCKRAN. The glory has departed. The House has shrunk in popular esteem. The newspapers pay little attention to the debates. Nobody is able to boost himself into fame by a speech from the floor. The people do not know "who's who" in Congress, and they care less. And the congressional oasis has become a desert because the Members have thrown away their ancient privileges "by a series of ill-considered rules," the very worst of which he was protesting against at that particular moment. As a word artist BOURKE COCKRAN is remarkable, and as a word artist everybody admires and enjoys him. But the House did not accept his point of view.

An odd feature of the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] was its self-contradictory quality. After he had told us all about the great men who sat in the House in other years, and the vast amount of space the press gave to their utterances and doings, he tipped over the apple cart by presenting another word picture in the form of a comparison between the Congressmen of to-day and yesterday. In the days when the House was flooded with oratory, when the rapt rhetorical eagles soared their loftiest, and the whole country listened to their tiniest whispers with bated breath, the House itself "took refuge in flight." The House, he said, gave the man who took the floor the attendance of the Speaker, of the Clerk, of the official reporter; it gave him everything but attention. * * * To-day I find the daily attendance largely increased. Members gathered together within range of the man's voice who is speaking, and the speakers have risen to the opportunity afforded by this closer attention.

Evidently the gentleman from New York, in the autointoxication of his remarkable oratory, did not perceive that, in the words just quoted, he gave his whole case away. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, that is just what he did do. Out of his own mouth it was demonstrated that the House had become a more efficient body than ever before as a result of adopting the limiting rules which he so strenuously deplored. By shutting off the stream of talk, which threatened to become a Pueblo flood, the Members of the House have been enabled to act, to perform the proper functions of a governing body. The gentleman from New York admitted that in the old days the Members of the House addressed their constituents in their speeches, not each other. It was for him a fatal admission. Of course, it is but natural that a great orator like the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] should enjoy the mellifluous sound of his sonorous voice, for each one of us, being human, enjoys showing off any little bag of tricks he may possess, but the business of a governing body is not to listen to platform oratory—no matter how eloquent and engaging—but to perform its labors as efficiently and expeditiously as possible. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] unconsciously demonstrated the worth of the rules which he sought to condemn. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Jacob Amberg, late of Troop D, Fifth Regiment United States Cavalry, Regular Establishment, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota, Are all of the cases in this bill in exact conformity with the rules of the committee as heretofore adopted—are there any exceptional cases in this bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; the Committee on Pensions has a set of rules which it tries to live up to in the consideration of all measures. There is one case, called to the attention of the committee by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], where the applicant is forced to wear a plaster cast reinforced with steel, day and night, and we have given him $50.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Sarah G. London, widow of Michael London, late of Company D, Twenty-second Regiment United States Infantry, and Company H, Thirteenth United States Infantry, Indian wars, Regular Establishment, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to substitute the word "her" for the word "him," in line 8, page 21. It is a grammatical error.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to substitute the word "her" for the word "him," in line 8, page 21. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of George R. Robinson, late of Troop F, Seventh Regiment United States Cavalry, Indian wars, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. On page 23, line 14, strike out the figures "20" and insert "30."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 14, strike out the figures "20" and insert in lieu thereof "30."

Mr. KNUTSON. That is a typographical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH, Speaker pro tempore, having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 5214, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KNUTSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 6507, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the bill H. R. 6507, and asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, there are several formal committee amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be offered en bloc after the reading of the bill has been completed and voted upon en bloc.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that certain formal committee amendments may be reported and voted upon en bloc after the reading of the bill has been completed. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that they are just formal amendments?

Mr. FULLER. That is all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KOPP, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MONTHLY PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2158, and pending that I would like to make some agreement as to time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2158, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2158) to provide for the monthly payment of pensions.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I would like to make some agreement as to time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this bill within the class of bills that the Committee on Pensions may call up as a matter of right? It changes the law in certain respects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair assumes that the gentleman calling it up will claim that right.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a change of law, as I understand, from quarterly to monthly.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will say that this makes the payment of pensions monthly, except as to veterans of the late war. It comes from the Invalid Pensions Committee and is proper.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it a privileged bill?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I think so.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think it is.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know how that is. I hope unless the gentleman from Texas objects that the Chair will not be asked to pass upon the question. There has been no objection made to calling it up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not passed upon it. Has the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] any request to make?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I would like to make a request to have an hour—30 minutes on this side and 30 minutes on the other.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want to make a point of order unless it is necessary. But I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not it is a fact that this bill will increase the expenses of the United States about $200,000 annually, and that the only benefit that will be derived from such an expense will be that the pensioners will receive their payments monthly instead of quarterly?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Answering the questions in the order asked, I will say that it will not cost $200,000.

Mr. BLANTON. How much will it cost?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I think to install the necessary adding machines and new machines that ought to have been installed a long time ago in order to save labor it might cost something like $100,000. The arguments for it are so many that I would not undertake to give them all to you in this short time. But the report that is filed here with the bill, and the letter from Secretary Fall, together with a letter from Mr. Saltzgaber, the ex-Commissioner of Pensions, goes into the matter very fully, and I think the gentleman will be convinced that great injustice is being done to those who are drawing their pensions once in three months, whereas the veterans of the late war are drawing them every month or two weeks under the vocational board.

Mr. BLANTON. One further question——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman let the Chair state the unanimous-consent request? The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND], if the Chair understands him, asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the bill is not privileged.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman makes the point of order, I want to be heard on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] makes the point of order that the bill is not privileged. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard on the point?

Mr. BLACK. I have nothing to say.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] is recognized.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this legislation comes from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I understand there has been a decision that certain legislation coming from the Pension Committee, which does not have jurisdiction of Civil War matters, does not have a privileged status. Rule LVI makes legislation from the Invalid Pension Committee of a general character privileged. It specifically says that general pension bills are privileged. This is a general pension bill. While it is administrative in character, it provides generally for the payment of all pensions, and therefore under Rule LVI is privileged. Going upon that assumption, I was authorized by the Invalid Pension Committee to report this bill from the floor of the House. The bill was reported from the floor of the House without objection or any reservation of a point of order against it. It would be my judgment that it is too late to raise a point of order against the bill, even if it was out of order, but I think it is clearly a privileged matter and has a privileged status at this time.

Mr. BLACK. I do not understand that the rules of the House prevent a Member from raising the question of privilege merely because a bill has been reported to the House. For example, there are many bills that have been reported and that are now on the Union Calendar and the House Calendar that are not privileged bills. And in the event that some gentleman should now call up one of those bills, I do not understand that a Member would be precluded from raising the question of privilege.

Now, this is strictly a legislative bill. Under the present law pensions are paid quarterly and the purpose of this bill is to change the method of payment and make these payments monthly. That would be a question of legislation. That, I think, is not contemplated by the rule, and therefore the bill would not be in order. So I make the point that it is not a privileged bill as contemplated by the rule.

Mr. FULLER. I take it that any pension bill coming from the Invalid Pension Committee that is not a private bill is a general pension bill, and under the rules of the House general pension bills reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions have the same status as appropriation bills or any other privileged bills. There can be no doubt under the rule that this is a general pension bill and has a privileged status under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] makes the point of order that the bill reported and called up by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] is not a privileged bill under the rule, and therefore that the motion that he has made is not in order at this time.

The rules of the House give to certain committees the right to report certain bills within their jurisdiction at any time. Among the committees that have that privilege is the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to report general pension bills. In the reporting of private bills the jurisdiction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is restricted to cases and over which jurisdiction is not given to the other pension committee, the Committee on Pensions. But in giving the Committee on Invalid Pensions the right to report at any time specific reference is made to general pension bills.

The Chair construes that to mean bills or legislation general in character, as distinguished from bills of a private character, or restricted in their purpose or effect.

The precedents seem to hold that the right to report legislation at any time carries with it the right to have it considered at any time, provided it is not in conflict with other rules of the House governing the procedure and precedence of legislation. The Chair upon examining the provisions of this bill finds that while it deals chiefly with the administration of the Pension Bureau, in that it authorizes the payments to be made monthly on the fourth day of each month, beginning not later than July, 1921, as distinguished from quarterly payments, as has heretofore prevailed for some time, yet this provision seems to be general in its character. It is not restricted to any particular class of cases. Furthermore, by its second section it repeals legislation which has heretofore been enacted which may be inconsistent with the provisions of this bill, seemingly dealing with general legislation which is now in force covering the same subject.

The Chair feels that under a strict and fair construction of the rule, having in mind the idea that the rule when adopted was evidently so framed and phrased as to expedite the business of the House, this bill can fairly be considered as a general pension bill, being general in its character, and therefore comes within the provisions of the rule conferring authority upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report at any time general pension bills, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill be limited to one hour—one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2158.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2158, with Mr. DOWELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2158, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2158) to provide for the monthly payment of pensions.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, let the bill be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That payment of pensions shall be made monthly, on the 4th day of each month, beginning not later than July, 1921.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, there are 771,000 pensioners to-day drawing pensions from the Government roll, including veterans of the late war who are drawing compensation. Of these there are 225,000 soldiers other than World War veterans, and about 281,000 are widows and dependents of such soldiers. Of course, the number of pensioners is decreasing very fast. The 200,000 pensioners who are on the compensation rolls from the World War raise the total to 771,000 pensioners.

The 200,000 men and dependents who are drawing compensation from this war are being paid monthly, for the most part. Some of them are being paid every two weeks. Those that are drawing through the Federal Board for Vocational Education get their pay every two weeks. I think during the war when this Congress passed the law definitely specifying that the veterans of the late war should be paid monthly we recognized a good business principle. Business generally is run by the month. Payments are made by the month or semimonthly. It is quite difficult for one who depends for his sole income upon the Government to adjust himself to a condition where he is paid only once in three months. There are more reasons for paying the soldiers and the survivors of the earlier wars monthly than there are for paying the survivors of the late war monthly, because those drawing for the earlier wars are more dependent upon their pensions.

It is generally known that if a Civil War veteran or a soldier of the Spanish-American War dies now, if he dies after two months of his pension has run and only one month remains to be drawn, if he has no widow and no children, no one can draw that pension. It does not go to his estate, and unless it is shown that the money is spent by some one to bury the soldier the accrued pension can not be drawn. As a result the grocery man does not want to take him as a risk for credit, because the grocery man or storekeeper understands that he has no status as a creditor if the soldier should die. Therefore the soldier becomes a creditor who is not in good favor, and he has to go to some one who will take the risk that he will live three months, and this insurance or risk taken by the merchant costs the old fellows some money, because the grocer is not going to take the risk unless he charges a higher price for his goods; and so frequently you find these old fellows in the hands of the loan sharks.

You often find the old veteran at the mercy of some grocery man who mistreats him, who charges him more than he charges others, because he takes the risk of not getting his pay at all. As a result it is a discrimination against the old fellow and a great hardship. There is no good reason advanced why these checks should not be made payable monthly. A great many of you gentlemen voted in favor of paying the soldiers of the late war every month and every two weeks. I can not understand why anyone who is willing that the veterans of the late war should receive their pensions monthly should object to paying the Spanish-American veterans or the Civil War veterans monthly when their needs are greater and when they are more dependent.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Gladly.

Mr. BLACK. In reading the report I see that the Secretary of the Interior has this to say:

> Owing to the vast amount of preparation, changing of the records, ordering new machinery, procuring more spacious quarters and desks for an additional clerical force, at least five months should elapse between the date of the approval of the act and the date the actual operations thereunder should commence.

I notice in the bill it is provided that these payments shall begin monthly after September, 1921. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to offer an amendment postponing that time, so that this confusion will not arise in the Pension Office?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman will note, this bill was reported in May.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I know that.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Personally I do not think it will take five months to do it. I want to be quite frank with the gentleman, because the question has been raised here with reference to the expense. I do not think the Committee on Appropriations will permit the Pension Bureau to spend any sum of money like that mentioned in the report. I know something about the machinery that is required. I have made a very careful study of it. I do not think it will take any five months to put the new system in operation there.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman, of course, has made a great deal more careful study of it than I have. I was just wondering, however, whether it would not be necessary to amend this bill.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I hardly think so. If it is necessary I am sure it will be amended at the other end of the Capitol. And let me say in that connection that I do not think it will require anything like the sum of money requested. I know it will require an additional expenditure; there is no doubt about that; and I do not raise any objection to the creation of more expense. There will be more work, and it will have to take more clerks.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman says he does not think it will require much additional expenditure. Has the gentleman any idea, or has the Pension Commissioner stated to the gentleman's committee, just how many more clerks he will need?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes; he said it will take 167 additional clerks, and he figures them out, and in the report you will find the number of clerks and the salaries they are to receive, and the total amount of money required.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What is the total amount?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. One hundred and sixty-seven clerks, at $1,440 apiece. I have not the time to figure that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That additional number of clerks will be required each year?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes; that is what he says—that it will require that many for the first year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And that it will amount to about $250,000.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If you gentlemen give them that much they will spend it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman of course knows that it will necessarily require a great many more clerks to issue these checks monthly than it will to issue them quarterly.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If the gentleman, who is a member of the Appropriations Committee and is usually very efficient in that regard, will undertake to investigate the Pension Bureau, in my judgment he will find that by the installation of some time-saving machinery down there they can do away with a great many clerks that they already have.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is clearly correct in that statement, but I have an idea that if this bill becomes a law—and I have no disposition to oppose it, because I appreciate the force of what the gentleman has said in favor of it—the gentleman will find that the present force will be very much increased.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If you gentlemen make the appropriation for it, the number will be increased, but I hope that this statement will be sufficient to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, two of whose distinguished members sit before me, to the fact that you ought not to give them all they ask. When they came before this committee they asked for considerable more than they afterwards agreed to take, but we decided to cut the appropriation out of the bill and let you fellows fight it out. I am satisfied that to install the necessary machinery will cost some money. They have got to have an increased number of adding machines and tabulating machines and check-writing machines, but they ask for $6,000 worth of desks, when there are acres and acres of desks that were taken out of the War Department offices after the close of the war. If they can get you gentlemen to appropriate for new desks they will not use those which are already in possession of the Government, and that is one of the expenditures included in the estimate of $250,000, and there are a great many other items in there that they can get along without.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is a law on the statute books which requires them to take any surplus desks that there may be.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. But they figure that in their estimates, because they will buy them if you let them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am quite sure that this Congress desires them to use the surplus desks, if there are any.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. There are tens of thousands of them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was wondering how the gentleman could figure that this change would cost very little money, when the Pension Commissioner states that he will probably require $250,000 in clerk hire in addition to what he now has, and then, in addition thereto, that he will require some of these various mechanical devices.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. If you go on in the same old way and do not put in any time-saving machinery, but continue hiring clerks in the old way and do not disturb the lack of efficiency, you will have a $200,000 appropriation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the force has been reduced by several hundred clerks.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. You have got not only to reduce the force but put in up-to-date machinery that will save employees, but I am not sure that the bureau will want to do that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They have some machinery there, but not as much as they need.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. As I understand, one of the objects of the bill is to put the Civil War veterans and the Spanish War veterans on the same level as the boys in the recent Great War in the matter of monthly payments. I do not know that I have any serious objection to that; but I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana, inasmuch as we have provided by law that a soldier totally disabled who served in the recent war shall receive approximately $100 per month, if there has been any agitation in the Committee on Invalid Pensions to put the veterans of the Civil War on the same basis and to give to those old fellows $100 a month instead of $72 a month which they now receive under the general law.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will say that under the present law the pensions are so liberal for a veteran of the Civil War that they draw $72 a month if they never had a gunshot wound or saw the enemy, if their physical infirmities are sufficiently serious. That is not on a basis of wounds but on the basis of service. There is a difference between a man's pension on the basis of service and on the basis of actual wounds received in the service. Under existing law the soldier of the Civil War can receive $100 for certain disabilities received in the service.

Mr. McKENZIE. Do not misunderstand me. I make no objection to these boys in the recent war getting $100, and it may not be enough. I am for the most liberal treatment of the boys who took part in the late war, but I can not see the difference between the old soldier who is paralyzed, who, perhaps, is unable to help himself, who received wounds, and a man who is helpless from wounds received in the late war.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I think the gentleman's point is well taken, and, in my judgment, there are a great many Civil War veterans who were wounded in the service and who we are not and never have been treating half so well as the veterans of the recent war, and to that extent I think the Government has been remiss in its duty. The gentleman asked if there were any complaints coming to the committee. Our chairman has received more than I have, probably, but I will say that I do have a great many complaints coming from old soldiers and their friends who think the veterans of the Civil War should receive the same amount of pension as the younger veterans.

Mr. McKENZIE. May we have reason to hope that the Committee on Invalid Pensions will take the matter up in the near future and deal with it?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I am not the chairman of the committee, but I recall that the legislative representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic appeared twice before our committee since I have been a member, and in each instance when the Smoot-Bland bill passed at $40 and the Fuller bill at $50, they assured us that they never again would appear and ask for an increase. So if they never appear again and ask for an increase and are satisfied, possibly there will be no more legislation of that character.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, we are now considering a bill, a new departure, a change of the present law, which, according to the gentleman from Indiana, who has charge of the bill, will increase the expenses of the Government at least $100,000 annually and which other gentlemen have figured will increase our expenditures at least $200,000 annually, and with only 42 Members present here in the House. That situation is what the country is facing to-day under the present régime.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now. I want to make some remarks, and then I will yield in a few minutes. That is the fact. This important measure that is going to take at least $100,000 out of the Treasury annually, and we are considering it with only 42 Congressmen present. If we want to vote on it and should call them in, 42 would understand what had been going on and the balance would depend on the door pages to tell them how they should vote.

Is this legislation and incident expense necessary? That is the question. The Secretary says that it will require 167 new clerks in the Pension Department alone at an average of $1,440 a year, which amounts to $29,178. He says that it will require $44,075 to buy the necessary machinery which he must have installed in the Pension Bureau under this different plan. He then says this:

> It should be noted that this estimate provides only for the additional cost in the Bureau of Pensions. The increased number of checks would affect the work in the Post Office Department and in three branches of the Treasury Department, viz, the Treasurer's office, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and the office of the Auditor for the Interior Department.

That is extra expense in addition to the $29,178 for clerk hire and $44,751 for machinery. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. We could save money by paying the pensions yearly?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, now, I am coming to that. The gentleman from Indiana said that there was a reason why this law should be passed; that when they died the amount of money that was due, if they had no wife or children, could not be paid to anybody, and that the merchants would not credit them because of that fact. That is a good reason if you did not have a way to get around it. I admit that the gentleman was using good logic and that that is a reason why it should be passed, if such condition could not otherwise be corrected, but let me ask the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, who usually looks around for various ways to meet the situation, if it would not accomplish the same end if he had brought in a bill to authorize the payment of the accrued pension to the creditors pro tanto where they had furnished credit to the pensioner before his death.

If he will bring in a little bill authorizing these creditors to be paid, he would meet the very question that he has raised as a reason for the passage of this legislation, which he admits is going to cost the people of this country at least $100,000 a year.

I present this question to the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] who is at the head of the reorganization committee, as to whether or not this expense to be added to our present expenses is necessary just now.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I have very great hopes that the reorganization committee by reallocating the services of the different departments so as to be in harmony with the main purpose of the department will decrease materially the employees in the Pension Bureau.

Mr. BLANTON. I feel sure the gentleman is going to do that, because he is earnestly engaged in the work that he is accomplishing.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. The gentleman seems to be opposed to the bill upon the theory that it will cost more money to pay these men monthly than every three months. Would the gentleman be in favor of a bill to pay the veterans of the late war every three months, and in that way save some money? We are paying 200,000 of them monthly now, and properly so.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I would not, because these men have been in the habit of getting their money monthly, as they had been working on salaries before they went into the war, and that plan exists under the present law. The State pensioners in practically every State receive their pensions quarterly. The pensioners in my own State, the Confederate veterans, paid by the State of Texas, receive their pensions quarterly.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Some of them receive them yearly, but they in no sense depend upon these small pensions, do they?

Mr. BLANTON. If we could not arrange in some other way to give them full credit for their pensions each month, then I would be in favor of this bill, because they must have the credit at the end of each month; but suppose we were to bring in a little measure that would authorize any creditor who furnishes them with groceries or dry goods or any of the necessities of life, in case of the death of the pensioner, to receive sufficient of the accrued pension to satisfy the debts, that would meet the emergency.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Oh, no; because the creditor would have to go through some court to have an adjudication of his claim, and he would have to file his claim with the Government, and there would be an indefinite delay and expense, and the soldier would necessarily be discriminated against because he was a three months' pensioner rather than a monthly pensioner.

Mr. BLANTON. We could provide that that could be paid on a voucher, duly authenticated, just like an authenticated account in court on which you sue.

Mr. REAVIS. Does not the gentleman believe that in determining the issue of just who was in fact a creditor, and in apportioning the amount due from the pensioner to the various creditors, that it would require a personnel which would add greatly to the number of employees?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, we could provide in this bill some regulations that anyone furnishing any commodity to the pensioners, such as groceries or dry goods, or medicines, in the way of a credit, could have a voucher signed at the time, in the nature of a receipt, showing the receipt of the goods, and that he could attach that authenticated voucher under his oath to his account in presenting it to the bureau, and that where it was so authenticated it should be allowed. That matter can be very easily handled. We could thus give these pensioners the benefit of their annuities each month without going to this expense of $100,000 a year, or, according to some of the Members who have figured it up, at least $200,000 a year.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Of course, the gentleman understands that a large part of that is for the installation of machinery, and only goes for the first year.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman realizes that the Pension Bureau wants 167 additional clerks itself.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It wants them; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And he realizes that the Post Office Department has got to have additional clerks, and that three branches of the Treasury Department have to have additional clerks, right at a time when we promised the country we were going to send 40,000 of the surplus ones home. And I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to the fact that, however glibly he can take a pencil and a piece of paper and figure out that we are not spending very much money, and that we are in good shape financially, that we can take the income taxes off the shoulders of the people, yet the money is going out just the same, and although it was stated that the 40,000 surplus clerks here in the city of Washington were going to be sent home, up to date only about 4,000 of them have been sent home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW].

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is almost as much reason for paying these pensions every month to those who are accounted worthy as there is for paying Congressmen their salaries every month. I do not believe that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who has just taken his seat, or anyone else who may vote against this measure, would be at all willing to have his pay postponed for three months. I do not know, but I am told, that there are mighty few Members of Congress who do not appear often before the "mourners' bench" down here at the Sergeant at Arms' office and secure a loan of three months' salary, because they are not able to get along with what comes to them every month. I merely mention that fact to remind the gentlemen of this House how much it means to be pinched with financial inconvenience; but it has been suggested that a Congressman earns his salary while the pensioners receive their checks as a gratuity.

Mr. DYER. Does not the gentleman think it is just the other way?

Mr. UPSHAW. I think that Congressmen, for the most part, earn more than they are getting, and I would heartily vote for an increase in salary. I frankly believe, from what I have learned, that there are few men in this House who are really able to live in Washington, however modestly and earnestly they try, and meet the tremendous demands upon them with their present salaries.

Mr. BURKE. Now you are talking.

Mr. UPSHAW. But that is not the question. If it be objected that Congressmen have earned their salaries by hard, efficient work and ought to be paid every month, I answer that these soldiers who are to receive these pensions earned their right to receive them; they earned it defending the Stars and Stripes [applause]; they earned it on the long and trying march; they earned it while keeping the sentinel's lonely vigil; they earned it on the crest of the soldiers' glory as they charged their country's foemen amid the battle's blazing hell; and those who are dependent upon them should be the inheritors of their bravery and their consecration. [Applause.] And I feel, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that a great Government like this, that boasts its dower of history and its plentitude of patriotism, ought not to stand on a little matter of expense when these brave old heroes and their dependents need this money every month.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Why has the gentleman waited for 25 years before passing this bill?

Mr. UPSHAW. Because the gentleman from Georgia has not been in Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. But he has been a very energetic spokesman for the people of the country during the last 25 years.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, in that connection I want to call attention to the fact that in my own district there are 1,447 veterans of the Civil War still living, at the average age of 77 years. The fact that it was not done 20 years ago does not help those old men. I agree with the gentleman from Georgia entirely.

Mr. UPSHAW. Let me add these other words. I have personally observed the pinch of poverty with many of these old soldiers. I remember one grand old man, Uncle Thornton Burke, 90 years of age, preacher, soldier, and patriot, who used to visit my bedside during the seven years I was bedridden, and I remember how he and his dependent loved ones used to be anxious for the belated pay day to come, and how hard it was for him to make ends meet. And I will say this, gentlemen, that I think it would be the part of a big-hearted, farseeing, grateful Government to reach out the hand of ungrudging liberality to these noble old heroes and those who inherit both their valor and their poverty. If they deserve any pension at all, they deserve it in such a way as not to give them any financial embarrassment. They ought to have their checks as often as a Congressman draws his salary. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, availing myself of the broad latitude permitted under general debate, I desire to briefly discuss a matter which I deem of vital importance to this Congress and to the people of this Nation. I refer to the Interstate Commerce Commission act as amended by the transportation act of 1920, which amendment emasculated the constitution and laws of many of the States of this Union, centralized the powers to control these important arteries of commerce in the Interstate Commerce Commission at Washington, destroyed State rights, and attained an accomplishment in centralization undreamed of by Hamilton in his palmiest days. This subject has been discussed to some extent at this session of Congress, and I refer to it now for the reason that I have introduced a bill seeking to amend the Interstate Commerce Commission act as amended by the transportation act of 1920, so as to expressly recognize the jurisdiction and power of the several States to regulate intrastate commerce, and I want to keep this agitation going until State rights in this particular are restored to the several States or until we are made to realize that there is absolutely no hope, and that there is inscribed on every State line in this Union the words which Dante saw over the doors of the doomed and damned, "All hope abandon, ye who enter here."

In discussing this question, I want us to keep in mind that the Federal Government is a Government of delegated powers, and that all the rights not delegated to the Federal Government were reserved to the States, and that the transportation act of 1920 assumed powers and jurisdictions in the several States over matters exclusively under State control. While the transportation act of 1920 has dealt a severe blow to the constitution and laws of many of the States, it is my purpose at this time to consider said act only in relation to the constitution and laws of the State of Texas. Like a killing frost, it not only struck down some of our laws but laid its withering blight upon our State constitution, handed down to us by the heroes of Goliad and San Jacinto, who threw off of us the galling yoke of Mexican oppression, and under which constitution we have worked out our own destiny and placed upon our statute books as splendid a system of laws as there is to be found in any State in this Union. Very often in the heat and rush of legislation laws are enacted which fall far short of accomplishing the purposes intended, and sometimes they go further than was anticipated. The transportation act, in my judgment, belongs rightfully in the latter class. If the transportation act of 1920 runs the gantlet of the courts and is held valid, then a part of the constitution of the State of Texas and many of the laws of that State and the United States antitrust laws are nullified. In order to demonstrate that this is true I will make some comparisons. The constitution of Texas, in section 1 of article 10, provides:

> That any railroad corporation or association organized under the laws for the purpose shall have the right to construct and operate a railroad between any points within this State.

Is there anything wrong about that provision in our Constitution? Is there anything in it which in any way interferes with the rights of any other State or of the Federal Government? And yet the transportation act of 1920 knocks it as high as Gilroy's kite, in this: Section 1 of paragraph 18 of the Interstate Commerce Commission act, as amended by said transportation act, provides that "No new railroad can be built or old line extended in any State without a certificate of convenience and necessity from the Interstate Commerce Commission." Why should the Interstate Commerce Commission be empowered to exercise control over the construction or the extension of a railroad wholly within the State of Texas? But not only does that act make provision as I have just stated, but it prescribes a lot of red tape and leaves the commission the right to prescribe more red tape about the procedure in getting that certificate of "convenience and necessity." There is a short line of railroad, part of which is in my district, running from Timpson, Tex., to Henderson, in Rusk County, Tex., a short distance of about 30 miles, owned and controlled, as I understand, by local capital. Suppose these people wanted to extend that line over to Tyler, Tex., the county seat of an adjoining county, they would have to hike off to far-away Washington, at a great expense and loss of time, and go through all kinds of red tape, lay around Washington and pay hotel bills, and procure finally if they could a certificate of "convenience and necessity." Such a law as that is an outrage and an unjustified and unwarranted interference with State rights. Texas has managed to get along very well with her own railroad construction for many years before a certificate of "convenience and necessity" was ever dreamed of. But that is not all. Article 6625 of the Revised Civil Statutes of Texas prohibits the "abandonment of any railroad once established and built, except to shorten the line or lessen the grade." This law is repealed by that section of the transportation act which provides that "all or any portion of a line of railroad may be abandoned upon the granting of a certificate of convenience and necessity by the Interstate Commerce Commission." More trips to Washington, more expense, and more endless red tape. Why should the Federal Government in this way interfere with purely State matters? But that is not all. Sections 5 and 6 of article 10 of the Texas constitution prohibits the consolidation of parallel and competing lines and also the consolidation of any railroad in Texas with any railroad organized under the law of any other State or of the United States. But these very reasonable, salutary provisions in our own State constitution are set aside by section 4 of paragraph 4 of the interstate commerce act, which requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to prepare and adopt plans for the consolidation of the railway properties of the United States into a limited number of systems, while paragraph 6 of said act provides that carriers can so consolidate without violation of law.

And remember that this act applies to all railroads, whether wholly within one State or not, and relieves them of any violation of the antitrust laws of Texas or of the United States. And let me say in this connection that the antitrust laws of the United States ought to be enforced rather than repealed. If the trusts and combines of this country which are controlling prices and exploiting the general public were put out of business and the rascals who direct and control them put in the penitentiary it would be a happy day for this Republic and considerably ameliorate the deplorable condition of the people. The antitrust laws of the State of Texas are based on that provision in our State constitution which declares "that monopolies and perpetuities are contrary to the genius of a free people and shall never be allowed." But the transportation act goes further and virtually repeals section 3 of article 10 of our State constitution, requiring all railroad companies organized or doing business in Texas to maintain a public office in the State. Section 20a of the interstate commerce act provides that all stock, bonds, and other securities issued by railroads may be issued only after approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, while paragraph 7 provides that the jurisdiction "shall be exclusive and plenary and a carrier may issue securities and assume obligations or liabilities in accordance with the provisions of this section without securing approval other than as specified herein." That provision nullifies the stock and bond law of Texas, which has been upon our statute books for nearly a quarter of a century, and which has been almost universally regarded by our people as a wholesome law. Under the interpretation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, section 15a and section 13 of paragraph 4, the Interstate Commerce Commission has assumed jurisdiction over purely State rates in this: They have held that all State rate increases, both passenger and freight, must be increased the same percentage over existing rates as interstate rates are increased, regardless of whether or not there exists any unjust discrimination. These provisions are contrary to section 2 of article 10 of the Texas constitution, which requires the Legislature of Texas to pass laws regulating freight and passenger rates and fares and to establish adequate agencies clothed with full power to carry out this provision. It was under this article of the Texas constitution that the Railroad Commission of Texas was created, and after it was created the Hon. John H. Reagen, who was at that time serving Texas and the Nation with honor and ability in the United States Senate, resigned his seat in the Senate and became the chairman of the Texas Railroad Commission. The provision of the interstate commerce act which I have last mentioned also nullifies article 6618 of the Revised Civil Statutes of Texas, which fixes passenger fares at 3 cents per mile, and I am informed that more than 3 cents per mile is now being charged in Texas. Section 1, paragraphs 15 and 16, of the Interstate Commerce Commission act provide that in the event of car shortage the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have authority, either upon complaint or its own initiative, to make regulations with respect to car service, locomotives, and so forth, without respect to ownership.

This provision nullifies all laws of Texas bearing upon the furnishing of cars and equipment to move Texas freight, and practical illustration of the hardships and injustice of such procedure was given by several of my colleagues from Texas at the time that transportation act was passed.

From the comparison of the laws which I have given it seems to me that it is quite plain that the Interstate Commerce Commission act as amended by the transportation act of 1920 is an unjustified and unwarranted interference with State rights as expounded by Jefferson and Madison. By the provisions of that act our State commission has practically been put out of business and about all there is left for them to do is to regulate spurs and see that closets are properly maintained. But the tragedy of the matter is that the people are having to suffer on account of excessive freight rates and inadequate transportation facilities. I do not maintain that if this law is amended and the powers of the railroad commission of Texas are restored that it will solve all of the problems of transportation, but I do believe that it will be a long step in the right direction. To put the railroads on a basis where they can earn a fair return on the capital invested and at the same time serve the public adequately and at a reasonable cost I realize is some problem, but I do think that we can get along better and serve the people better with the powers of State regulation restored. With freight rates so high that the farmer is unable to get his produce to market, it means his financial ruin; and when you injure the farmer you injure the Nation, for he produces that upon which the world lives and he is the backbone of civilization. He has not had a square deal in the past. He wants no special favors. He seeks no special legislation. But he does claim the right to a square deal, and everyone should not only be willing but anxious to accord him that right, for on his prosperity depends the prosperity of the Nation and of the world.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to compliment this committee for bringing out this bill and doing tardy justice to the old soldiers who fought for this country.

We have 641,000 employees on the Government pay roll and all are paid every 30 days. About the only persons to whom the Government is paying money who do not receive the same every 30 days are the men who fought to sustain and preserve it. It does seem to me that for a great Government to say it can not afford the little extra expense there would be to pay the men that fought for it every 30 days instead of every 90 days is a peculiar kind of economy.

I have tried to vote for every economy that I could since I came to Congress. I want to lessen the burden of taxation on the backs of the people of this country, but I know the people of my district would feel that I had dishonored them if I should attempt to save them a few paltry cents by saying that the old soldiers who went out in 1861 and fought for them could not have the same treatment that the 641,000 employees of the Government receive. These grand old boys are passing away very rapidly. They saved the Nation by fighting for it. I want to see them have every favor this Government can grant, as I want to see every man who enlisted to fight for this Nation in every war receive every favor its people can bestow.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. ANDREWS. I wish to say to the gentleman that most of the clerks in the departments in Washington receive their pay every 15 days.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes; and they work only seven hours a day, and they only want to work five and one-half days a week, and they get 30 days' vacation and sick leave with full pay. I want to see these old soldiers get their money every 30 days, the same as do all others who receive money from our Government. I know lots of them in my district who are dependent on their pensions and now have to run accounts for 90 days at the grocery stores. They need this monthly payment of their pensions. They have asked for it; they are entitled to it; and I want to again compliment the committee for bringing out this bill, and I hope it will speedily pass. [Applause.]

Mr. UPSHAW, Mr. FOSTER, and Mr. SANDERS of Texas were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I consider this an entirely meritorious measure. I think the reasons for its passage far outweigh the sole objection to its passage. Aside from the suggestion made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] and others that Government employees, as well as pensioners of the World War, are paid every month or every 15 days, that is true throughout all vocations. It is an exceptional case where any class of men are paid only quarterly. And I think that this discrimination in the case of the old soldiers should be done away with.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is not my purpose at this time to discuss the merits or demerits of the pending measure, but in view of the fact that we are now dealing with the subject of ex-service men, the subject of the Government doing its duty to those who have served the Government, I think it fitting that at this time I should make a few remarks concerning Camp Logan and reply to some of the criticisms that have been made of Hospital No. 25, located in the city of Houston, my home town. And I want to say, gentlemen, that I believe that wherever criticism is deserved that criticism should be made. And I believe that wherever men have done their duty or tried to do their duty they should be given due credit for the performance of that duty.

A great deal of criticism has been made concerning Camp Logan or Hospital No. 25. Some of it has been made on the floor of this House. Some of it has been made in the press of the country. I want to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a special report on United States Public Service Hospital No. 25, Houston, Tex., by the chief general inspector of the service, as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, coupled with that request I ask permission that those who have criticized the hospital, including myself, be permitted to extend their remarks by putting their side of the case in the RECORD. There have been several adverse reports sent here by legions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a very poor practice to permit the coupling with a unanimous-consent request another unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT], aside from the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], that he may be permitted to insert certain matter?

Mr. STAFFORD. I demand the regular order, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman has no right to couple with that request another request. He can submit his request separately.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point is well taken. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hope that every Member of the House will read the report, every line of it. It is short and to the point.

Also in that connection I will say that the gentleman from Texas, my colleague [Mr. BLANTON], put into the RECORD a very voluminous document and a number of affidavits on April 20 last and criticized very severely an officer of that camp. And now, in order that the House may understand the situation, I would like to read a letter signed by my colleague from Texas, addressed to Gen. Hugh S. Cumming, dated April 29, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 29, 1921.

Gen. HUGH S. CUMMING,
Surgeon General United States Public Health Service,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GEN. CUMMING: Evidence furnished me from several sources has convinced me that Maj. Herbert Caldwell, at Hospital No. 25, Houston, Tex., was in no way actuated by any personal feeling in re his action concerning Thomas E. Pinkerton, concerning whom I sent you a report on April 15. I find that Maj. Caldwell is an excellent gentleman, with deep sympathy for the present trials of our ex-service men, and I feel sure that Maj. Caldwell was sincere, honest, and conscientious in whatever action he took, whether mistake or not was made. I feel that justice to him demands that this statement be filed with the record.

Very sincerely, yours,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

I had hoped and had waited for some time for my colleague to rise upon the floor of the House and seek to right the wrong in the place where he had committed it, by putting the above letter in the RECORD himself; but inasmuch as he has not done so, I feel, in justice to Camp Logan, in my city, and in justice to the men there in charge, to insert it myself.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Certainly.

Miss ROBERTSON. I have criticized that camp very severely, as to conditions last year, but recently the information has come to me that the camp has been cleaned up and is now in perfect condition. I am glad to make that statement. I did not say the camp was a swamp. Bad conditions did exist, but have been rectified. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I thank the lady. Mr. Chairman, before leaving my home for Washington, about the 20th of March, having heard a good deal of criticism of Camp Logan, I made an inspection of it. Mr. Chairman, I have no greater interest in the camp than the interest and general welfare of the boys who are located there. I went through that camp from one end of it to the other, and I want to say for Maj. Axline, in charge of that camp, that never was there a man more open to inquiry and inspection. Everybody who went out to investigate that camp—every ex-service man, every man representing the Legion, and everybody else—was allowed free access and opportunity to make a full and complete investigation into every detail of the management and operation of the camp and conditions as they existed. Mr. Chairman, now I will tell the House the cause of the dissatisfaction with Camp Logan. It is not the buildings and it is not the place where it is located. No person, I dare say, who ever went out in that beautiful grove in which Camp Logan is situated, with its beautiful trees, and rested under those beautiful skies will ever complain. This is the case not only with regard to the general patients there, but men afflicted with tuberculosis, who were said to have requested that they be removed to other places, but when the time came to go they asked to be permitted to remain there, to hear the birds sing and to have the cool Gulf breezes fan their fevered brows. [Applause.]

The trouble with Camp Logan is the same trouble that exists in every camp in this Union, namely, that the men there are not getting their compensation and are not getting the treatment that they should receive from Washington. I had a list of every disabled enlisted man at Camp Logan, compiled by the Red Cross under the supervision of Maj. Axline. It was mailed out of Houston on the 1st day of April. It came to Washington and went to the office of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, and from there it was transmitted to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, where it has been since perhaps the 15th day of April.

That list showed that out of 840 men in Camp Logan entitled to compensation, out of 840 patients, there were only 398, I believe it was, who were drawing compensation. Since that time I have been at work with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to get that list worked out and to secure to these men their compensation. I have been trying to work for the men; I have not sought any political advantage or anything of that kind. I do not get up on the floor of the House and read every letter I get from an ex-service man about his compensation. If I get a letter from an ex-service man I go to the Bureau of War Risk, and try to get the relief which he is entitled to. That is what I have been doing. [Applause.] For one solid week the Bureau of War Risk Insurance has had a special force at work on that list, and to-day they have asked for a continuation of one week more, as they say then they will have the trouble straightened out and that these men will receive justice.

That is the thing, gentlemen, that these men have been complaining of, and not the location of Camp Logan. It is a beautiful place. I wish you could all go there and see it. I wish you could go there to-night. I wish you could go there on some of the hot nights in July and August, when you will be burning up here in Washington. I wish you might move away down into the State of Texas and go out under the trees at Camp Logan, where these boys are rolling on the grass and enjoying the balmy breezes from the Gulf. You would understand then why those poor tubercular patients do not want to leave Camp Logan.

Mr. Chairman, I have other letters here that I would like to insert in the RECORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not contend that everything has gone right at Camp Logan at all times. It has not gone right all the time anywhere—people do err, and until humanity reaches a state of perfection will continue to err.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a letter from Gen. Cumming, addressed to myself, transmitting a copy of the special report and one concerning the conduct of Surg. John M. Holt, who was at one time stationed at Camp Logan Hospital. I am not informed as to the facts in the case, but will say without hesitation, if he has been guilty of misconduct, he should have meted out to him full punishment, and I am putting the letter with reference to him in the RECORD because I want the House to know all the facts so that you may read them and know them and understand them all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The documents referred to are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, July 1½, 1921.

Hon. DANIEL E. GARRETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In reply to your inquiry as to the status of the case of Surg. John M. Holt, United States Public Health Service, against whom allegations of financial irregularities have been made, I have the honor to state that information was received by this office on May 16, 1921, that the Department of Justice had been investigating into certain allegations which had been made against the actions and the character of Surg. John M. Holt, of this service.

An investigation was immediately ordered by the general inspection service. A report of this investigation, together with a report of the investigation conducted by the Department of Justice, was received on May 27, 1921. Upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney General of the United States detailed an officer of the Department of Justice to formulate charges against Surg. Holt. These charges were received at this office on June 10.

A board has been convened by the Secretary of the Treasury before which Surg. Holt will be brought to answer these charges, and the matter will be promptly and vigorously prosecuted.

Yours, very truly,

H. S. CUMMING,
Surgeon General.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, June 11, 1921.

Hon. DANIEL E. GARRETT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of the special report made on the general conditions existing in the United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 25, Houston, Tex. This report is drafted from a very large number of reports of inspections and special investigations conducted at the above-mentioned hospital subsequent to September 1, 1920, documents previous to that date not having been used in the compilation of this report.

The basic documents are on file in the office of the general inspection service of this bureau, and are, of course, open to the inspection of any Member of Congress who is interested.

Very truly, yours,

H. S. CUMMING,
Surgeon General.

SPECIAL REPORT ON UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE HOSPITAL NO. 25, HOUSTON, TEX.

(By Chief, General Inspection Service.)

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, June 11, 1921.

Memorandum to the Surgeon General United States Public Health Service, Washington.

1. In compliance with instructions, I have the honor to submit the following information with regard to United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 25, Houston, Tex.:

2. This hospital is located in the city of Houston, which has a population of 150,000 and which, with its numerous lines of railway, is one of the principal railroad centers of the Gulf coast. The hospital proper is located 3½ miles outside of the city of Houston, being reached by paved roads in good condition, a trolley line which runs from the city into the reservation, and also by jitney service.

3. The reservation contains 200 acres of ground, 75 acres of which are devoted to lawn and 2½ to garden, ample space being allotted for recreation, tennis court, basket-ball court, croquet court, and baseball diamond being provided.

4. The soil is sandy, with a clay subsoil, and while the elevation is only about 80 feet above sea level, the drainage, which at the time the cantonment was taken over from the Army was not ideal, has been, by ditching and filling, immeasurably improved until now it is entirely satisfactory.

5. The hospital was built by the Army as an emergency military camp, and consists of some 74 buildings of the wooden-pavilion type on concrete pillars, 16 of the buildings being of the 2-story variety, with fire escapes (ladders attached to buildings) at each end. All buildings have been recently painted and most of them are connected by covered, screened ambulatories, and though not rat proofed, are completely screened, and the screening on all of them is new and in good condition.

6. The grounds contain a large number of pine and oak trees, and the lawn and grounds are clean and well kept, illuminated by electricity, and altogether the plant presents a neat and attractive appearance.

7. With regard to the suitability of the climate, the following is a quotation from a special report made in January, 1921, by George Thomas Palmer, attending specialist in tuberculosis:

8. "A definite and perhaps unfounded prejudice against the climatic conditions at Houston unquestionably prevails. * * * I am impressed that tuberculosis can be satisfactorily treated at Houston, although the weather conditions are not ideal. It appears that the most definite prejudice in regard to the climatic conditions at Houston is entertained by a class of physicians who have an equally unreasoning prejudice in favor of the climatic conditions of Arizona and New Mexico."

9. In this connection attention is respectfully invited to the official records of the United States Army which show that the cantonment (Camp Logan) during its occupation by the Army had a most enviable record. It is true that Houston is situated in a subtropical climate, and the charge has been made that malaria-bearing mosquitoes were breeding on the hospital grounds and that "frogs were croaking under the buildings." Under the Public Health Service practically no case of malaria has originated at this hospital. But few cases have occurred, and these were either imported or were recurrences of previous attacks. Mosquito breeding has been prevented by proper drainage, by oiling, and by the stocking of streams and ponds with minnows, which devour the mosquito larvae, and by other methods of the sanitary engineer.

10. This hospital was inspected by a general inspector of the Public Health Service on February 1 to 5, inclusive, 1921; by a different inspector general of the Public Health Service on March 5 to 9, inclusive, 1921; and on May 22, 1921, the acting chief of the General Inspection Service made an inspection of the hospital, at which time the previous reports by the general inspectors referred to above were checked up and the condition stated by them to exist were found to be correct.

11. This hospital has a capacity of 1,035 patients, and at the time of the May inspection there were on duty at this hospital 33 commissioned officers of the Public Health Service, 42 nurses, with a sufficient number of orderlies, attendants, and other noncommissioned personnel.

12. The hospital is inspected daily by the officer of the day, inspections being made at meal times as well as at unannounced hours during the day. The formal weekly inspection is made by the medical officer in charge, who also holds daily conferences with the chiefs of the various departments of the hospital.

13. The fire-fighting apparatus consists of 33 axes, 172 pyrene extinguishers, 29 3-gallon pony extinguishers, 11 hand-pump extinguishers, 36 pails, 650 feet of 2-inch hose in buildings, 900 feet of 2½-inch hose on reels, 2 35-gallon pony chemical extinguishers with 50 feet of hose, 2,100 feet of 2½-inch hose in fire station. The hospital has its own fire department under a competent chief.

14. Water is supplied from artesian wells through the mains of the city of Houston and is examined monthly.

15. The sewerage system is connected with the system of the city of Houston, and has been inspected and approved by the city engineers and health department.

16. The dining room is clean, well ventilated, electrically lighted, and accommodates 800; enlargement has been recommended. The chipped enamel ware of which complaint was made at one time has been replaced by suitable table ware.

17. The equipment of the kitchen is not as complete as it should be for the most convenient and economic administration, but is functioning well; a bakery is being installed; dishes are sterilized and washed in Crescent washing machine, and food is conveyed on carts with hot-water jackets to the dining room.

18. Abundant food of good quality is served, including ample fresh milk, fresh vegetables, and eggs, the diet list being prepared under the direction of the chief dietitian assisted by four assistant dietitians.

19. Eight different diets are served to meet the needs of the different classes of patients treated at this hospital, namely, liquid, light, regular, special tubercular, vegetable, nephritic, and diabetic. These diet lists are prepared especially each day and are submitted to the medical officer in charge for his approval.

20. The quarters for both officers and nurses are inadequate, but recommendations have been transmitted for the correction of this condition.

21. This hospital has been the source of a great many complaints from patients and from other individuals not patients in the hospital. Each of these has been promptly and very thoroughly investigated, not only by general inspectors of the General Inspection Service, but by officers of different posts of the American Legion and other disinterested investigators. The hospital has been open to inspection by these various inspectors at all times, and the medical officer in charge has given them the fullest cooperation and all possible facilities to aid them in obtaining the desired information, and in practically every instance the complaints have been found to be not only more or less trivial in character but without any foundation in fact.

22. Of the various reports of inspections which have been submitted to the bureau the most favorable have been rendered by an officer of the Public Health Service, who is himself not only an ex-service man, and who has been connected with the Public Health Service since his discharge from the Army 18 months ago, but who is also a very prominent citizen of the State of Oklahoma.

23. Upon the occasion of his last inspection, which was made in March of the present year, he caused to be posted the following notice:

"Surg. T. H. Scott, General Inspection Service, United States Public Health Service, is on the station and will be in his office at the Administration Building, Sunday, March 6, at 10 a. m.

"Any officer, employee, or patient having complaints to make or other matters which they wish to bring to the attention of the inspector should report to him at this hour.

"T. H. SCOTT, Surgeon (R.),
"U. S. Public Health Service, General Inspection Service."

24. In response to this notice, out of a hospital population which at that time numbered 1,026 only 2 patients came forward with complaints. One of these complaints was with reference to the fit of an orthopedic shoe, and the other was from a patient who differed with the surgeons as to what the proper treatment of his case should be, an operation for chronic appendicitis having been recommended, to which the patient objected because of his confessed fear of the knife.

25. One case which has caused extensive comment was that of a patient, Thomas I. Pinkerton. This case was referred by Mr. A. B. Culbertson, adjutant, Brady Shelton Post 173, American Legion, Athens, Tex., to the Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, seventeenth Texas district, and by Mr. BLANTON referred to the Surgeon General.

26. This case was made the basis for an attack on the officers of United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 25, on the floor of the House, in the early part of the present year, and subsequently the subject of an attack upon the administration of the hospital, also from the floor of the House. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 61, No. 9, p. 466.)

27. As the result of the complaint referred by Mr. Culbertson, and subsequent to the attacks upon the officers of the hospital, and upon the administration of the institution, and at the request of the Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, Mr. Culbertson was requested to make a personal complete inspection of the hospital, and render a personal report to Mr. BLANTON. In response to this request, the following report was submitted by Mr. A. B. Culbertson over his official signature as adjutant Brady Shelton Post 173, American Legion, under date of April 27, 1921:

ATHENS, TEX., April 27, 1921.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I take pleasure in handing you herewith my complete report of conditions as I found them at Camp Logan. In this connection I have the honor of conveying the thanks of this post for the thoroughness with which you handled the Pinkerton case which was placed in your hands by me. Your splendid efforts merit the commendation of our post as manifested in the vote of thanks and appreciation that you have doubtless received by this time.

I had the privilege of making a thorough investigation of this case and conditions generally at United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 25, and have compiled this report for your information. From the intimate knowledge you have of Mr. Pinkerton's view of the question as presented to me, together with such reports as were obtained by you, I am quite certain you know I went to Houston fully determined to avenge the alleged cruel treatment of our former comrade in arms.

It is not necessary for me to state that I was thoroughly prejudiced against the authorities at Camp Logan, believing, as I did, that militarism existed there in the rankest form. Frankness compels me to admit that the many reports that had come to us that Thomas Dismuke Post, No. 52, at Houston, and its commander, R. R. Lewis, were neglecting their duty, convinced me that they were refusing to cooperate with us in this investigation. Indeed, reports you sent me from other posts indicated, by inference, that such reports as had been made by that post had been influenced by concealed motives or as a result of a meager knowledge of conditions at Camp Logan.

In the light of all this information, and being adjutant of the post, where Pinkerton holds his membership, I naturally placed little credence in the reports made by Commander R. R. Lewis in my first conference with him. However, I consented to go with him to Camp Logan, determined, however, to conduct my own investigation in my own way.

We arrived at the hospital about 10 o'clock a. m., on April 21, 1921. It being a holiday, most of the personnel were not on duty. We were cordially received by Maj. Axline, who gave us permission to make any investigation we cared to and interview whomsoever we cared to. I asked Maj. Axline to give me his version of the disturbance which had been the basis of the complaint in question. It was essentially as follows:

"It was requested by the Red Cross that all personnel of the hospital attend a dance at the Red Cross Hall on the night of September 1, 1920. Military officers of near-by camps were invited. Some of the patients protested against this, giving as their reason that the Red Cross Building was for patients as well as officers, and inasmuch as we were not in the Army, there should be no distinction between officers and enlisted men. I informed them that none of the officers of the hospital were in the military service and that rank did not enter into the arrangements. The Red Cross had complete charge of invitations and could invite anyone they wanted to come.

"I had been in charge of this hospital only a few weeks. Previous to my coming here there seems to have been little discipline and it seemed that some of the boys did not care for the rights of others. So an attempt was made to break up the dance. This was averted, however, but the following day a riot would have ensued had there been leadership among the boys. It therefore devolved upon me to take immediate action in order to protect Government property and protect hundreds of innocent people.

"The day following the dance I had four psychiatric cases arrested and placed in jail charged with being of 'unsound mind'; among these was Mr. Pinkerton. He had previously been under observation and was a psychiatric patient. His actions had been such as to convince us that he was of a violent type. On one occasion he became angry and attempted to strike a man Hughes with a chair. Other patients took the chair from him and he then threw himself on the floor in a rage and lay there for some time. He frequently had difficulties with other patients.

"In order to prevent further trouble we arrested these men because we knew that their mental condition was such as to cause them to participate in this disturbance or any other that might occur. Although they might stay in the hospital an indefinite time and not give any trouble, yet when excited they are violent. Pinkerton was not in bed at the time this disturbance occurred. He had been instructed that he should remain in bed and would do so when it was convenient. He stayed in bed long enough to have his breakfast served but would then get up and go to town. We have three affidavits that he was not in bed and not even in the ward but was seen going toward the Red Cross Building.

"When men arrested on lunacy charges would agree to transfer, we dismissed their charges and transferred them to institutions where they could receive the proper treatment. In this case we made request on the district supervisor for transfer of Pinkerton to California. The transfer was made and the charges dismissed, but Pinkerton refused to go. We then made request to have him transferred to Wisconsin. Pending this transfer he was held in the county jail four days after the former complaint had been dismissed. I do not think I ever requested the county officials, either verbally or in writing, to hold him after the complaint was dismissed, but we did not call for them; they just held him.

"He was arrested with my full knowledge and consent. I should do one or two things under the circumstances—prefer criminal charges against them for attempting to incite a riot, which would have, on conviction, sentenced them to the penitentiary, or do as I did."

I passed through the wards in search of Charles H. Ramsey, one of the men Mr. Pinkerton requested me to see. He reports as follows:

"Pinkerton was my 'buddie.' There is nothing I would not do for him, but the fact is he was not in his ward that night. I saw him go toward the Red Cross Building that night, and he was protesting loudly against the dance.

"He was a psychiatric patient and exceedingly nervous. I was in the same ward with him for several weeks. He frequently had difficulties with other patients and would fight a circular saw when mad. Dr. Caldwell was very good to Pinkerton. On one occasion I saw him take his fan out of his own office and place it on a box by Pinkerton's bed. Dr. Caldwell is one of the finest men and doctors I have ever seen. There is nothing he would not do for us and would grant us any request in reason. He always listens to our complaints patiently and will assist us when possible."

I then interviewed another of Pinkerton's witnesses, Miss Hayse, who was his night nurse at the time of the trouble. She stated that he obtained a pass that night and was absent from the ward for some time. She said he was a psychiatric case and was very nervous. He frequently had arguments with other patients and, it was reported, had trouble with former nurses. She never argued with him and got along well with him.

I found that every patient I talked to would fight for Dr. Caldwell. He was liked by all the patients, they reported.

This investigation convinced me, in spite of my extreme prejudice, that the case deserved no further serious consideration.

I am convinced, however, that the executive was not justified in placing these men in jail, even though they had taken part in the disturbance, and although they had been insane. The Government should provide adequate doctors, nurses, and attendants to care for these nervous cases without having to lock them up. I think this rule would apply as to cells in hospitals except in extreme cases. With proper attention and careful continuous observation, I believe that little restraint would be necessary. Without defending any action taken in this case, I think the Government is committing an unpardonable crime in not providing Camp Logan, and every other hospital in this Nation caring for soldiers, with all the assistance necessary to care for its patients. These cases are now confined, when necessary pending transfer, in ward 17 B at Camp Logan. With adequate assistance most of these cases would not have to be confined.

After a thorough investigation I reported to Maj. Axline that if claims for compensation could be promptly handled, 90 per cent of his troubles would be over. Less than one-half of the patients are receiving compensation. The Red Cross filed claims and has all necessary papers executed, but no action is taken in Washington for months. In one ward we found 33 men. Sixteen of this number drew no compensation. Of this number 4 drew $80 per month, 1 $90, and the other 12 drew from $8 to $34. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance should be decentralized and a branch located at Houston fully empowered to issue checks there to all men entitled to receive it. There are over 1,000 patients in this hospital, which means that over 500 are receiving no compensation notwithstanding their claims have been filed for months. A preliminary report is sent by the hospital of each man's case within five days, and this report is accompanied by a report by the Red Cross as to his status as regards compensation. With the thorough knowledge of the requirements, the Red Cross anticipates what the bureau will ask for in each case, and send this information at once. Therefore there is no excuse for these claims being delayed so long except the departmental red tape. We need action now, immediate and conclusive, before many of these loyal American soldiers pass over the great divide.

Before concluding this report I want to comment on the general conditions at Camp Logan. My report will vary but little from that of Mr. E. A. Moreno, of Houston, which is attached hereto. The matter mentioned in paragraph 4 of his report has been attended to according to his suggestions. In regard to paragraph 5 of said report, I was informed by Maj. Axline that requisition had been placed for enameled tops for all tables but they had not yet been received. All knives and forks were clean. Dishes are steam sterilized, and the conditions mentioned in paragraph 7 of his report have been remedied as per his suggestion. As to paragraph 10 of his report, I was unable to see where any improvement could be made on the grounds, except that a few small gutters should be cleaned out. The menus had been changed. I ate the following menu at noon:

Chicken gumbo, chicken fricassee and dumpling, steamed rice, butter beans, bread and butter, preserved peaches, coffee, milk.

The mess for the personnel was as follows:

Chicken and noodle soup, baked chicken, herb dressing, mashed potatoes, butter beans, preserved peaches, coffee, milk, buttermilk.

In this connection I might add that Commander Lewis keeps a menu in his office and can keep a check on whether mess is served according to menu.

Paragraph 23 in the attached report has been corrected by receipt of new plate and other dishes, for which requisition was made last September.

As stated in paragraph 24 no officer was on duty when I was at mess.

Everything was absolutely sanitary the day I was there except the officers' refrigerator and floor around it. It needed supervision and necessary scrubbing. The store rooms were well supplied with the very best quality of foods, such as I am not able to have in my home. All patients reported that food was plentiful and well cooked. The only complaints they made were that they were not receiving their compensation or that they wanted to be discharged. Officers are not permitted to apprise patients of their troubles or how long they may be required to stay there. This causes dissatisfaction.

If there is anything more you would like to know about conditions at Camp Logan or any cases that are referred to you, I am sure you will find Commander Lewis and Thomas Dismuke Post No. 52 ready to serve you. I do not believe that you will find a man in Texas aside from the personnel of the hospital that knows more about this hospital than does Mr. Lewis, and this despite the fact that I would not take his word and conducted my own investigation.

Under conditions with all the red tape and delay at Washington I do not believe that United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 25 could be run with better system and management.

All tuberculosis patients are to be transferred to Arizona at an early date. You doubtless know that this transfer is necessary inasmuch as you have been trying to effect these transfers.

Assuring you of our continued good will and deep appreciation for your efforts, I am

Yours, very truly,

A. B. CULBERTSON,
Adjutant, Brady Shelton Post 173, the American Legion.

28. The perusal of the above report will convey conviction to any unbiased mind that the attacks which have been made upon the hospital and upon its administration have been unjustified.

29. It will be recalled that Mr. Culbertson himself originated the complaint with reference to the treatment of Thomas I. Pinkerton, and that he states frankly in his report that at the time of his arrival at the hospital for the purpose of making this investigation, he was thoroughly prejudiced against the authorities at Camp Logan, believing that militarism existed there in the rankest form, and that the favorable reports rendered by another post commander were of such a nature as to lay that officer open to the charge of neglecting his duty in refusing to cooperate in the proper investigation of the hospital.

30. The records of the investigations, of all complaints against United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 25, of all general inspections of the institution, and of all special investigations made by officials of the bureau of the Public Health Service are of record in the office of the Surgeon General, United States Public Health Service, and are open to the inspection of anyone entitled to public records at all times.

31. While it is admitted that because of the semitropical climate of the city of Houston, and of the prolonged summer season, and because of the temporary character of the buildings, and the consequent added fire hazard, the hospital possibly is not the most ideal; at the same time it is as favorable as that of a great many other Government institutions against which no complaint whatsoever has been lodged on account of situation, and it is submitted that the hospital is as efficient and in as good physical condition as any other hospital of the service of a like character and construction, and that it is functioning smoothly and obtaining good results for the patients who are hospitalized there.

32. On the 31st day of March, 1921, the records of the institution showed the presence of 251 cases of tuberculosis. Of these 19 were reported as unable to travel, 15 were awaiting reservation, and 200 others were eligible for transfer. On April 6, 1921, the medical officer in charge was requested to arrange for the transfer of as many patients as practicable on account of the approaching hot weather, "taking due cognizance of the desires of the patients to be transferred or to remain."

33. It is very difficult to secure the consent of tuberculous patients at this hospital to be transferred to the National Sanatorium, Johnson City, Tenn.; to United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 55, Fort Bayard, N. Mex.; and to United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 50, Prescott, Ariz., and many of the patients are not cases suitable for transfer to the two latter hospitals on account of the elevation, more than a mile above sea level.

34. As a result of the authority quoted above, all patients eligible for transfer and suitable for transfer have been transferred to other hospitals, so that those cases of tuberculosis at present remaining in the institution are either cases unable to travel or prefering to remain at Houston.

Respectfully,

WM. S. TERRIBERRY,
Assistant Surgeon General,
United States Public Health Service,
Acting Chief General Inspection Service.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I yield to the lady from Oklahoma [Miss ROBERTSON] five minutes. [Applause.]

Miss ROBERTSON. I wonder if anybody on either side of the House was ever a postmaster? I was for eight years in Oklahoma, where there are people from all over the United States. I learned many things from the quarterly pension checks that came into my hands. I wonder if the gentleman from Texas—Texas, down on the Mexican border, where an Army went in 1848 made up of the flower and the chivalry of the South—I wonder if he knows how many southern gentlewomen look forward to that quarterly check? At first I could not understand how United States pension checks were coming to the widows and daughters of the most unreconstructed Confederates I had ever known, until I found out that they were 1848 checks. Do you begrudge those gentlewomen the payment of those checks monthly? Not many of them are left. But do you know what it means to a woman to have a little money of her own, no matter how happy she is in her surroundings with the children who care for her most tenderly? Let those widows of 1848 get their money monthly. Do not object, you Texans! [Applause]

I say nothing about the war of the sixties. I am of Yankee blood, they say, but next to my father the best man I ever knew wore the Confederate gray. I pinned on the big silent heart of that Confederate soldier the cross of honor that no one after him was worthy to wear. So I say nothing about the pensioners of the sixties, those old men, some of whom used to think I was not really just and honest with them, and that I was holding back the pension check. Their anxiety was pathetically painful to me. Then, sometimes they died just before the end of the quarter, and there was trouble. Many a time I have spent hours and hours hunting for that quarterly check. I knew what it meant to them. But I pass over that.

I am perhaps one of three women in the United States wearing not an auxiliary badge but a member's badge of the Spanish War Veterans. [Applause.] Because my camp at home made me a member in good standing. One of the pledges that we of the auxiliaries take is that as the men of 1898 died to wipe out sectionalism, as they came together, North, South, East, and West, in the common cause of our country, so we will do all in our power to wipe out sectionalism. So these people who bore and suffered and had little glory, those men of 1898 who did work for their country that will be appreciated later, shall they not get their pay monthly?

I am not going to talk any more. I try not to talk very much, for silence is golden [applause], and I realize that every extra word we speak here makes that much more expense to the United States Government. [Laughter.] Some of us might begin, as I shall begin right now, to save money by stopping. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, every complaint that I have ever put in the RECORD concerning Camp Logan, Hospital No. 25, has come from ex-service men in sworn affidavits, from complaints made by commanders and adjutants of the American Legion posts in Texas, and from investigating committees, some of whom were headed by women who went there to inspect this hospital in behalf of the soldiers.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I can not yield. The gentleman would not yield to me.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the Chair will not take this out of my time. I found out in connection with these numerous complaints that there were over 200 tubercular patients there, nearly all of whom were clamoring to get away from that hospital, away from damp climate near the coast, out into the Western States, and I got the Health Department to issue an order transferring 200 of these tubercular patients West—to hospitals in western Texas and into Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona—200 at one time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. As soon as I personally investigated and found out concerning this officer—Maj. Caldwell—I exonerated him of the charge soldiers had made that he had acted through malice. Some patients claimed that he was actuated by personal motives. I investigated the matter and found that that was incorrect, and immediately I sent a letter to Maj. Caldwell himself exonerating him and telling him that the investigation showed that he was not guilty of the charge of acting through personal malice, and I sent a similar letter down here to the Health Department. And I did this without anyone requesting it.

What more could I do? I want to say that these bad conditions existed at that hospital in a large measure, but that the hospital has been cleaned up now, though it is still no place for tubercular patients. I am glad the men made the complaints, because it caused the camp to be cleaned up and the men to get better treatment. All this little flurry by the gentleman from Texas is put in the RECORD—he disclaims that it is political, but I think it is more politics than anything else. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman want to put in anything except his own remarks?

Mr. BLANTON. My own remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleagues for this privilege, as it is impossible in two minutes' time to adequately answer this sudden outburst of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT], the first expression of any length we have had from him on the floor this Congress since he has come back among us this last time, except when, on June 3, 1921, he obtained consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, page 2107, and exercised such privilege by placing in the RECORD of June 6, 1921, pages 2107 to 2109, not an "Extension of remarks," but what he designated as "Speech of Hon. DANIEL E. GARRETT of Texas, in the House of Representatives, Friday, June 3, 1921," while, as a matter of fact, he then made no speech, but merely said, "Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD," which was granted.

There was no occasion whatever for this outburst, Mr. Chairman. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] had known the one-hundredth part of what I have been doing during the last 12 months to better the conditions of this hospital and to assist the eight hundred and odd ex-service men there he would have maintained his usual silence.

If I had reflected in any way upon the city of Houston, I would hold him blameless, for I admire any man who defends his home, native or adopted, from attacks. But I made no attack whatever upon the city of Houston. I would defend its good name far quicker than would the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT]. It is much nearer and dearer to me than it is to him. It means much more to me than it does to him.

It is my birthplace. It is my old home. He is not a native of Houston, but it is his adopted home city. He is not even a native of the State, as Texas is his adopted State. I am a native Houstonian and a native Texan, while he is an alien to both. The house in which I was born, nearly 49 years ago, is still standing in the heart of Houston. The house in which my dear mother died, when I was a small boy, is still standing at the corner of Fannin and Lamar Streets, in the city of Houston. It is a magnificent city of magnificent people, but it is no place for people afflicted with tuberculosis.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] has no occasion to get angry with me because people from Houston have called on me for help. When his constituent, Mr. R. I. Smallwood, of 3120 Liberty Street, Houston, Tex., wrote me asking for certain information and data, I immediately sent it to the gentleman, addressing him as "My dear colleague," and telling him that in accordance with our courtesy regulation here I was sending him the letter from our mutual friend, which I was sure he would give his usual prompt attention, and I sent a copy of such letter of transmittal with my reply to Mr. Smallwood. But, lo and behold, much to my surprise the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] returned Mr. Smallwood's letter to me, calling on me to answer his constituent. Thus he increased my heavy correspondence by two letters concerning one case.

HOSPITAL NO. 25.

On January 26, 1921, Hon. F. W. Galbraith, jr., then national commander of the American Legion, from national headquarters at Indianapolis, Ind., sent a memorial to Congress, in which he reported the condition of this Hospital No. 25, at Camp Logan, Tex., as ascertained by him through a special investigation made, and he then reported to Congress that its location was poor, that it was mosquito ridden, that it had bad surface drainage, that it was overhot in summer, that the buildings were dilapidated, that the roofs leak, that the plumbing was unsatisfactory, and in summing up he said that this hospital never could be made satisfactory even if sufficient funds for repair were available. He said nothing about birds singing.

Hon. W. L. Thompson, adjutant of Travis Post, No. 76, American Legion, at Austin, Tex., stated that before life would be worth while at this Hospital 25 Congress would have to make an investigation and have a general clean-up, stating that it is useless to say that Houston is no place for a man suffering with tuberculosis. He said nothing about birds singing.

Dr. George Thomas Palmer, president of the Illinois Tuberculous Association and the leading expert authority on that dreaded disease in the United States, who was sent by the Government on a tour of inspection in the South and Southwest to pass on hospital conditions, reported to me in April, 1921, that this Hospital 25 was distinctly the most unsatisfactory of all the numerous hospitals visited by him on his inspection trip throughout the South and Southwest. He also then reported that its location is not good; that the buildings were dilapidated, and the general air of the place unsatisfactory for the housing of tuberculosis patients, who require a cheerful and pleasing environment during their long period of treatment, stating that he was then impressed that the climate there would be disagreeably hot in summer and damp all the year. He said nothing about birds singing.

The United States Weather Bureau advised me that during the year commencing May 1, 1920, and ending April 30, 1921, the total rainfall at Houston, Tex., was 58.54 inches, and including the days that there was a trace of rain there were 164 days on which there was rainfall during that year. The Weather Bureau did not report any birds singing during these 164 damp days.

I had been beseeching the Public Health Service for months to transfer at least 200 of these tubercular patients, who wanted to be transferred, to western hospitals, but the excuse was given me that there was no room. I entered into an exhaustive investigation to check up all the hospitals in west Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado to see how many tubercular patients they had already, how many vacant beds they had for such patients, and what was the capacity of each hospital for tubercular patients, and I found that on January 1, 1921, the San Angelo Sanatorium, at San Angelo, Tex., had 31; the Southwest Sanatorium, at San Angelo, had 11; the Grace Lutheran Sanatorium, at San Antonio, had 3; the Van Ormy Cottage Sanatorium, at Von Ormy, Tex., had 14; the Hendricks Laws Sanatorium, at El Paso, Tex., had 48; the Wiley Sanatorium, at El Paso, Tex., had 46; the Sunny Crest Sanatorium, at El Paso, Tex., had 8; the El Paso Sanatorium, at El Paso, Tex., had 9; the Homan Sanatorium, at El Paso, Tex., had 9; the Long Sanatorium, at El Paso, Tex., had 22; the Mountain Sanatorium, at El Paso, Tex., had 2; the Finn Sanatorium, at El Paso, Tex., had 2; the Rolston Sanatorium, at El Paso, Texas., had none; the Texas Sanatorium, at El Paso, Tex., had none; the Baptist Sanatorium, at El Paso, Tex., had none; the United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 55, at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., had 893, but still had 107 vacant beds, and had a capacity for 1,000 tubercular patients; the United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 9, at Stanton, N. Mex., had 26; the St. Mary's Hospital, at Roswell, N. Mex., had 9, with a few vacant beds; the St. Mary's Hospital, at Gallup, N. Mex., had 15, with a few vacant beds; the St. Anthony's Sanatorium, at Las Vegas, N. Mex., had only 1; the Mountaineer Sanatorium, at Alamogordo, N. Mex., had 6, with 13 vacant beds; the St. Joseph Sanatorium at Albuquerque, N. Mex., had 7; the Methodist Sanatorium, at Albuquerque, N. Mex., had 3; the Valmora Sanatorium at Valmora, N. Mex., had 14; the Tucumcari Hospital at Tucumcari, N. Mex., had 2; the St. Vincent's Sanatorium at Santa Fe, N. Mex., had 1; the Albuquerque Sanatorium at Albuquerque, N. Mex., had 2; the Baptist Hospital at Clovis, N. Mex., had none; the Grant County and Ladies' Hospital at Silver City, N. Mex., had none; the Fitzsimons General Hospital at Denver, Colo., had 329, and then had 171 vacant beds, and had a capacity for 500 tubercular patients; the United States Naval Hospital at Fort Lyon, Colo., had 37, and then had 63 vacant beds, and had a capacity for 100 tubercular patients; the Bethesda Sanatorium at Denver, Colo., had 2; the Swedish National Sanatorium at Denver, Colo., had 5; the Agnes Memorial Sanatorium at Denver, Colo., had 1; the St. Joseph Hospital at Denver, Colo., had none; the St. Luke's Hospital at Denver, Colo., had 1; the St. Anthony's Hospital at Denver, Colo., had 2; the Sunny Rest Sanatorium at Colorado Springs, Colo., had 19; the St. Francis Hospital at Colorado Springs, Colo., had 3; the Bethel Hospital at Colorado Springs, Colo., had 1; the Star Ranch in the Pines Hospital at Colorado Springs, Colo., had 21, with 29 vacant beds, with a capacity for 50 tubercular patients; the Cragmore Sanatorium at Colorado Springs, Colo., had none; the Bonny View Sanatorium at Colorado Springs, Colo., had 16, with 16 vacant beds; the Modern Woodmen Sanatorium at Colorado Springs, Colo., had 17; the Ebenezer Mercy Hospital at Brush, Colo., had 2; the Glenwood Springs Sanatorium at Glenwood Springs, Colo., had none; the Bates Hospital at Ouray, Colo., had none; the University Hospital at Boulder, Colo., had none; the Mennonite Sanatorium at La Junta, Colo., had 1;: the District Hospital at Victor, Colo., the John T. Morrison Hospital at Fort Collins, Colo., and the St. Mary's Hospital at Pueblo, Colo., were not open on January 1, 1921, for tubercular patients, but later, on March 1, 1921, had 1, 2, and 2, respectively.

I besieged the Public Health Service until finally it issued an order to have 200 of the tubercular patients transferred from Hospital 25 at Houston to western hospitals. Before I got this order I showed the Public Health Service that from December 1, 1920, to the latter part of April, 1921, 23 patients had died of tuberculosis in Hospital 25, and that on April 26, 1921, there were 25 tubercular patients bedridden in Hospital 25, 16 of whom became bedridden within a little over four weeks after admission.

And where tubercular patients had willfully refused to stay in such hospital longer, and had gone away without leave, and because of such disobedience of orders were refused transportation to other hospitals, Col. R. G. Cholmeley-Jones, then Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, on April 29, 1921, issued an order reciting that because of the fact that Service Hospital No. 25, Houston, Tex., was found to be in unsatisfactory condition and not a desirable place for the treatment of tuberculosis cases, is considered sufficient excuse for Mr. Hargis's refusal to remain at this institution after July 31, 1920, and his case was reconsidered, and the supervisor of District No. 14 was ordered on that date to issue transportation to said George F. Hargis, C-437536-R, from his home to whatever hospital in the West it was deemed advisable to designate.

During the month of December, 1920, alone, 44 tubercular patients were admitted; 77 in January, 1921; 69 in February, and 60 in March, and during the month of April, 1921, 72 tubercular patients were admitted, and during the month of May, 1921, 98 tubercular patients were admitted to said Hospital 25, at Houston, Tex. And at this hospital, during December, 1920, 6 patients died with tuberculosis; during January, 1921, 7 died there with tuberculosis; during February, 1921, 3 died there with tuberculosis; and during March, 1921, 5 died there with tuberculosis.

In the month of April, 1921, 64 tubercular patients were transferred from Houston to western hospitals, and during the month of May, 1921, 74 tubercular patients were transferred from Houston to western hospitals. And with all the additions to this Hospital 25, which is used as a kind of clearing house, on May 29, 1921, there were only 118 tubercular patients remaining in said institution, and of this number arrangements had then been made to transfer 22 within a few days. The bedridden ones could not be moved. And some were so afflicted that they could not stand a high altitude, and where they demanded transfers, their requests would be denied, as it was considered that such a move would be fatal to them.

On May 5, 1921, after the transfer to the War Risk Bureau, executive officer of the Public Health Service, Surg. J. D. Long, acting for the Surgeon General, advised me that while an effort was being made to discontinue the use of Hospital 25 for tubercular patients so far as is practicable, it would probably be impossible to avoid sending patients from the immediate vicinity to that hospital for observation in instances where the diagnosis had not yet been made, or for temporary hospitalization in emergency, and this policy was carried out by the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, after the Secretary of the Treasury had transferred such functions to it from the Public Health Service on April 19, 1921.

Following a conference I had with Col. C. R. Forbes, the present Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, on May 13, 1921, he sent instruction by wire to Dr. Tarleton F. Moore, supervisor of district No. 14, with headquarters at North Akard Street and Pacific Avenue, Dallas, Tex., to arrange transfer of patients from Hospital 25 at Houston, Tex., to Hospital 50 at Prescott, Ariz., for all patients able to travel and who desired transfers.

At such time when Dr. Moore was threatening to retransfer some of the tubercular patients from El Paso to Johnson City, Tenn., and they rebelled, I got him on that same day to send orders to Dr. Moore not to transfer any tubercular patients from El Paso against their wishes. Some had wired me, and some had wired my colleague, Mr. HUDSPETH, from other hospitals there, and he also got such an order issued.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] intimated that I got a few letters from some of the ex-service men in Hospital 25, and every time I got one I put it in the RECORD, for political purposes. During the months that I endeavored to get these men transferred to Western hospitals I did from time to time on the floor of the House criticize the Health Department for not making the transfer, and did read a few letters from the men who were suffering, hoping thereby to force action. But I have helped hundreds of ex-service men in Hospital 25, who appealed to me for assistance, some with tuberculosis and others with various other afflictions. They did not tell me where they lived when they wrote, and I did not know in whose district they resided; but when an ex-service man called on me for help, and said that his case was urgent, I could not stop to ask him where he lived, but proceeded immediately to have the bureau act on his case. A great majority of these men lived in other States than Texas, and my helping them was of no political benefit to me whatever. They were men in trouble. They appealed to me. I could not turn them down. I went to the War Risk Bureau and Health Department with their cases, and got action for them. They told their comrades in each hospital where they went that I had gotten their compensation, which resulted in numerous others writing me for help. It has caused my office force as well as myself to work late at night sometimes, and on Sundays and on holidays, but I have gladly performed this extra work. And it little becomes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT], who refused to attend to the business of his own constituent which I courteously sent him, but returned it to me for attention, to question my action or motives.

Just to give the gentleman an idea of the extent of the help I have rendered to men in his Hospital 25 at Houston, the following are some of the tubercular patients with whom I have had correspondence and have tried to assist in getting their claims adjusted, to wit:

William Aaron, of Garland, Ark.; Russell B. Adams, of Waco, Tex.; John Aggers, of Houston, Tex.; Gordon R. Alderman, of Waco, Tex.; Arid H. Anderson, of New Orleans, La.; George K. Anderson, of Rising Star, Tex.; James E. Anderson, of Bayside, Tex.; Leslie L. Anderson, of Watts, Okla.; Lloyd A. Andrew, of Stillwater, Okla.; Louis Arnold, of Waco, Tex.; Sherman E. Aynes, of Pottsboro, Tex.; Thomas Bagwell, of Kenefick, Okla.; Willie R. Baker, of Jarrell, Tex.; Loman A. Ballard, of Tallassee, Ala.; William Ballew, of Dallas, Tex.; Ed. Barnes, of Houston, Tex.; Isaac O. Barrett, of Garvin, Okla.; James H. Barrett, of Texarkana, Tex.; George E. Baskins, of Houston, Tex.; Clyde Bays, of Santa Anna, Tex.; Leslie M. Bays, of Houston, Tex.; John F. Bednarowicz, of Houston, Tex.; John Bell, of Okolona, Ark.; Albert Berkley, of Navasota, Tex.; Paul B. Blackburn, of Oklahoma City, Okla.; George H. Blankenship, of Walnut Ridge, Ark.; Grover E. Bomar, of Greenbrier, Ark.; Thomas E. Bonds, of Nocona, Tex.; Wesley Bonner, of Forest City, Ark.; Will Boyd, of Aubrey, Ark.; Joe Bridges, of McRae, Ark.; Evans I. Brooks, of Cushing, Tex.; Frank M. Brown, of Cisco, Tex.; James Brown, of Muskogee, Okla.; John L. Brown, of Houston, Tex.; Sam Brown, of Montrose, Ark.; Walter Brown, of Newkirk, Okla.; Willie Brown, of Pine Bluff, Ark.; James Bunt, of Austin, Tex.; Aaron Burrell, of Beaumont, Tex.; Danile D. Burkhalter, of Timpson, Tex.; Robert H. Burney, of Waco, Tex.; Lonnie Butler, of Houston, Tex.; Cordia B. Cabe, of Houston, Tex.; Allen R. Cannon, of Colt, Ark.; Isaac M. Capps, of Houston, Tex.; Robert Carroll, of Quanah, Tex.; Benjamin A. Carruth, of Hamburg, Ark.; Erwin Carter, of Richland, Tex.; Ivey B. Chambless, of Houston, Tex.; James Sidney Chapel, of Delight, Ark.; Zib T. Chapel, of Murfreesboro, Ark.; William J. Coffey, of Denton, Tex.; Marcel S. Coger, of Jonesboro, Ark.; James L. The foregoing are some of the tubercular ex-service men only whom I have tried to help and assist. At least 25 of the above are now dead. But I have helped many other men afflicted with tuberculosis. Write the 35 men at the San Angelo Sanatorium, the ones at El Paso, in Colorado, in Prescott, Ariz., and Fort Bayard, N. Mex., and see if you can find a single one who has ever appealed to me in vain. Write the many still at Hospital 25, Houston, Tex., both those afflicted with tuberculosis and others with many other afflictions, and see if you can find a single one who has come to me for assistance and whom I have not tried to help. I have written them all that I do not know where they live, and do not care, because they are entitled to help, and having appealed to me I am not going to stop to find out where they live.

Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit that if my colleague from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] had known these facts, or if he had conferred with Mr. Ivey B. Chambles, C–511093; Mr. Roy Kirkpatrick, C–522715; Mr. W. R. Cowart, C–657557; Mr. Hyman Sobol, C–247653; Mr. James Charles McMaster, C–288037; Mr. Britton F. Morgan, C–287757; Mr. Willie Lee Taylor, C–559055; Mr. Eugene Johnson, C–510640; Ray Mills, C–601872; Mr. George Roberson, C–605131; Mr. Lewis Hawthorne, C–490647; Mr. William H. Morgan, C–513601; Dean Adams, C–354715; Albert T. Hockaday, C–385091; Mr. Felix Hester, C–393424; Mr. Hayne S. Strong, C–546883; Mr. Jesse J. Lucas, C–294540; Mr. George C. Gamble, C–601166; Mr. Eugene Lewis, C–426251; Mr. Barney Head, C–602871; Mr. Albert Kuehne, C–565026, and the many, many others there in Hospital 25, Houston, Tex., he would have found out that I had been working day and night presenting their various claims, with but one purpose in view, to render some assistance to our ex-service men, and he would never have made this attack on me. But I will forgive him, if he does not do it any more.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in reply to what the gentleman from Texas has just said, I will take only a moment. I made an inspection of Camp Logan before the gentleman ever put anything in the RECORD concerning it, and it was not then and never has been in such condition as the gentleman has tried to convince the country it was in. The gentleman says, concerning his criticism of Maj. Caldwell of Hospital No. 25, "What more could I do than to write the letter and say that this man ought to be exonerated?" I will tell the gentleman what he could have done. He could have come upon the floor of this House where he committed the wrong, and retracted it, and here on the floor of this House righted the wrong which he committed against this officer of the Army. That is what he could have done, instead of slipping around and sending a letter through the mail to the Surgeon General with an apology. He did not commit the offense before the Surgeon General; he made it before the country and the House of Representatives and on the floor of the House of Representatives. He could at least have taken time here on the floor, where he appears so often, to apologize to this gentleman whom he had wronged.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I deny the gentleman's statement that I am trying to play politics with the boys down there, because a great many of them live in other States, and most of them live out of my congressional district, and they could not vote for me or render me any political aid for my services to them and I know they would never consider the matter on so low a plane. I am trying to represent these boys regardless of where they come from and trying to help them. I got a list of all of them, and have it up now before the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and am advised that it will be worked out in another week and all claims be given proper attention. How many did the gentlemen get? A letter now and then, and he read it in the RECORD. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That payment of pensions shall be made monthly, on the 4th day of each month, beginning not later than July, 1921.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 4, strike out the word "July" and insert "September."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WALSH, having resumed the chair, Mr. DOWELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2158) to provide for the monthly payment of pensions, and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DYER) there were 93 ayes and 1 no.

Mr. DYER. I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to the vote, because it shows that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Texas make a point of order that no quorum is present, and the gentleman from Texas objects on that account. It is obvious that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 267, nays 6, answered "present" 4, not voting 153, as follows:

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY. I voted "aye." I wish to withdraw that vote of "aye" and vote "present."

The name of Mr. COLLIER was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

On motion of Mr. BLAND of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, beginning where we left off yesterday.

PERIOD FOR DOING ANNUAL ASSESSMENT WORK ON UNPATENTED CLAIMS.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4813) changing the period for doing annual assessment work on unpatented mineral claims from the calendar year to the fiscal year ending June 30 each year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, in the temporary absence of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the majority leader, and at his request, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER, OKLA.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6652) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River, Muskogee County, Okla.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The lady from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, H. R. 6652, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by act of Congress, approved May 27, 1920, to be built by the county of Muskogee, State of Oklahoma, across the Arkansas River, at a point near Fort Gibson, in said county and State, between sections 16 and 21, township 15 north, range 19 east, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this bill is upon the calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the lady from Oklahoma is recognized.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] spoke a few moments ago of how the mocking birds sing. The mocking birds sing to-day in the old National Cemetery at Fort Gibson, where these days we are burying the boys of the World War beside the boys of the Spanish War, the boys of the Civil War, and the boys of 1848, and the boys of 1812. Every vehicle that goes to that cemetery must pay a heavy toll. To relieve that situation the citizens of the county of Muskogee stand ready to construct this bridge. They have the money already waiting, and this must be attended to by the day after to-morrow. The bill calls for no money, but will simply enable these people to put that bridge across the river at that point, and I ask that this bill be passed now. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS ARKANSAS RIVER NEAR WEBBERS FALLS, MUSKOGEE COUNTY, OKLA.

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the next bill on the calendar (H. R. 6653), to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at a point near Webbers Falls, in Muskogee County, Okla.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The lady from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 6653. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge, authorized by act of Congress approved May 27, 1920, to be built by the county of Muskogee, at a point near Webbers Falls, in section 18, township 12 north, range 21 east, in the said county of Muskogee, State of Oklahoma, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, strike out "time" and insert "times."

Page 1, line 8, after the word "county," insert the words "of Muskogee"; and on page 2, line 1, strike out the words "State of Oklahoma" and insert the words "and State."

Miss ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill for a similar purpose, and I think it is unnecessary to take up the time of the House further in explanation of it. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Miss ROBERTSON, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the preceding bills were passed was laid on the table.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will resume the calling of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, DISTRICT OF NORTH DAKOTA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 78) authorizing the appointment of an additional judge for the district of North Dakota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether or not it is the intention to make this a permanent position or simply a temporary one?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, it is provided in the bill that this appointment of a new judge shall be for the purpose of relieving the situation which is there now, and that when the present judge retires or dies this other judge to be appointed under this bill shall be the judge and the only one. The bill provides for only one judge.

At present, I will state to the gentleman, there is only one United States district judge. That judge is physically unable to perform the work. In fact, he has not been in the State to hold court for more than two years, and the only way in which business can be transacted at all is by having judges from other States sent into North Dakota to attend to the business of the court.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The thing I have in mind is this: Anybody who has had any experience on the bench knows that court work comes in waves, and my idea would be that if a judge was competent and physically able to do the work, with the ordinary run of litigation, there would be no necessity for another judge in North Dakota except to tide over an emergency. If it is simply to take care of an emergency, I shall not object.

Mr. DYER. That is the situation, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to provide for a judge for North Dakota, which now has only one judge. The present judge of the United States district court for North Dakota has been upon the bench there for some 25 years. He is now, I think, 67 years of age. Under the law he can not retire, although he is physically unable to perform any portion of the work of his office. He is not able even to live within the State on account of the climate and his condition of health. The result is that he has not been in the State to hold court for more than two years, and the situation there is very bad, and the necessity for a judge to be sent there is an emergency matter entirely.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Did we not pass a bill through this House about two years ago to take care of cases just like that?

Mr. DYER. I do not recall it, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. YOUNG. That would take care of only the cases where the judge had reached the retirement age of 70 years.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Not before?

Mr. YOUNG. Not before.

Mr. DYER. The bill we passed provided that where the judge had reached 70 years of age and was physically unable to perform work a judge could be appointed to take his place. This does not provide an additional judge for North Dakota, because when the present judge retires or dies there will be only one judge that is appointed under this bill, and it will not create any additional judge except for the time being.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will remember that just such a case was in existence in my own State a few years ago, where the district judge was sick and unable to attend to the business, and Congress created an extra judge, but stipulated that there should be no extra district. Now, there is a bill before Congress to provide this extra judge with a district; in other words, to create a new district. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Missouri further if he does not think that some of the Federal district judges over the country, who open court at 10 o'clock and hold until 12 and then adjourn for noon until half past 2 and then hold from half past 2 to about 4 or 5 and then adjourn, and then sometimes take a recess for two or three days extra, ought not to go to work and clean up the docket?

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I do not know of any such cases as he refers to, but from the information that has come to the committee of which I am a member—the Judiciary Committee—there is great overwork in many places in this country now by the Federal judiciary, growing out of extraordinary work that has come to them.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has practiced around Federal courts, has he not?

Mr. DYER. I used to be a practitioner.

Mr. BLANTON. And he has seen with what great deliberation some of them, at least, transact business, has he not?

Mr. DYER. Well, I can not say anything in criticism of the judges whom I have had the honor to appear before. I will say to the gentleman that in my own district the work is so great that the present judge is unable to perform it, and one of the judges who retired under the law the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER] referred to, and who is now 84 years of age, an uncle of mine, is working practically every day to help relieve the situation in that district.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman is on the Judiciary Committee, but it seems to me from his statement of the case that it comes entirely within the statute we passed, which provides where the judge is unable to perform his duties the President may appoint a judge for the time being, who shall be the ranking justice of that district, and shall assign the disabled judge to such work as he can do, and with the final retirement of the disabled judge the new judge who is appointed becomes the sole judge in the district.

Mr. DYER. I am acquainted with the statute the gentleman refers to, but it provides that the judge must have reached the age of 70 years, which is the age limit.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think the gentleman is in error about that, but I may be mistaken. I never do swear to what is in a statute.

Mr. DYER. That is the case.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the retirement act. We passed a subsequent act two years ago under which Judge Webb was appointed in the western district of North Carolina because the judge had become incapacitated to discharge his duties, and Judge Boyd and Judge Webb are both holding courts there now. Judge Webb designates Judge Boyd from time to time to hold such court as he is able to hold.

Mr. DYER. The judge must have reached 70 years of age under that act, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Judge Boyd has passed the age of 70.

Mr. DYER. He must have reached the age of 70 years. But the judge in North Dakota is 67 years of age. He has been on the bench 25 years and has been unable to retire by reason of existing law. This, Mr. Speaker, is a real emergency, and I hope the gentleman from Texas will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] is correct in his statement, that the act passed two or three years ago authorized the appointment of a temporary judge to take charge of the business.

Mr. DYER. He was not able to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. Until we look up that statute I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. DYER. The statute referred to by the gentleman, upon which he bases his objection to this bill, is as follows:

> In the event any circuit judge or district judge having so held a commission or commissions at least 10 years continuously, and having attained the age of 70 years, as aforesaid, shall nevertheless remain in office and not resign or retire, as aforesaid. The President, if he finds that any such judge is unable to discharge efficiently all the duties of his office by reason of mental or physical disability of permanent character, may, when necessary for the efficient dispatch of business, appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an additional circuit judge of the circuit or district judge of the district to which such disabled judge belongs. And the judge so retiring voluntarily, or whose mental or physical condition caused the President to appoint an additional judge, shall be held and treated as if junior in commission to the remaining judges of said court, who shall, in the order of the seniority of their respective commissions, exercise such powers and perform such duties as by law may be incident to seniority. In districts where there may be more than one district judge, if the judges or a majority of them can not agree upon the appointment of officials of the court, to be appointed by such judges, then the senior judge shall have the power to make such appointments.
> Upon the death, resignation, or retirement of any circuit or district judge so entitled to resign, following the appointment of any additional judge, as provided in this section, the vacancy caused by such death, resignation, or retirement of the said judge so entitled to resign shall not be filled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLING CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 124.

Resolved, That the enrolling clerk of the House, so long as that office is held by the present incumbent, be paid additional compensation at the rate of $1,000 per annum, beginning April 9, 1921, payable out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the distinguished ex-Speaker as to the reason why this should be presented at the present time, and not go through the Committee on Accounts for report?

Mr. CANNON. I have it in black and white and can vouch for the accuracy of the statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the House as to the reason why this should not go through the Committee on Accounts?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The present enrolling clerk of the House was appointed April 9 of this year, succeeding Mr. Hempstead, who resigned, and who succeeded Mr. McKenney in the Sixty-second Congress when Champ Clark was elected Speaker.

February 26, 1917, during the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, the then enrolling clerk was given an increase of $1,000 per annum. The resolution was offered by Mr. MANN, who realized the importance of having a competent man in that office and also recognized efficiency irrespective of political affiliation. The resolution was later made permanent law as regards the then incumbent, and from that time up to the beginning of the present Congress the enrolling clerk has received $4,000 per annum.

The present enrolling clerk is thoroughly efficient in every respect. He served as assistant enrolling clerk during the Sixtieth and Sixty-first Congresses and also during the last Congress. He took a vacation while Mr. Clark was speaker. He understands every detail of the office and has rendered very satisfactory service. The Clerk of the House and the last enrolling clerk recommend him very highly and do not hesitate to state that a better man for the place could not have been found.

The office of enrolling clerk is one of the most responsible and important in Congress, and his salary should be equal to that of those serving at the desk. Much devolves upon him to keep the machinery of legislation running smoothly. The least slip may result in serious consequences. Very few are aware of the responsibilities of the enrolling clerk. Those who are familiar with his duties must agree that he should be paid a salary commensurate to the work he performs.

The resolution simply calls for the same salary that has been paid the enrolling clerk for the last three Congresses, and will perpetuate efficiency in that office.

Mr. McKenney held the office of enrolling clerk for more than 20 years and Mr. Hempstead for 10 years, until he resigned at the beginning of the present Congress. Efficiency has always been considered first in selecting a man for the place. The office was practically removed from patronage when two years ago the Republican caucus passed a resolution to retain the Democrat who was then holding that place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to object. As I caught the reading of the resolution, it simply provides that this salary shall apply during the incumbency of the present incumbent of the office?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and until otherwise provided for. It is a resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does it make it permanent law?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. It does not make it permanent law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The reasons set out in the memorandum read at the desk are quite persuasive, and it should be made permanent law.

Mr. CANNON. This is a resolution similar to what was offered by Mr. MANN when Mr. Hempstead took the office, in a Democratic House, and held that office until he resigned. The present incumbent, who was appointed to succeed him, had in two prior Congresses served as assistant enrolling clerk, and in the last Congress as assistant enrolling clerk. It does not change the law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennesee. As I say, I am not objecting to the resolution, but the reasons given would be very persuasive toward having a law fixing the salary of that position permanently.

Mr. CANNON. But it would require legislation to make it permanent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, DISTRICT OF NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. DYER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent to again take up the bill for the North Dakota judgeship. I call attention to the statute which is now the law, which says the President can not act until the judge has reached the age of 70. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] will not object. I think the bill ought to be passed. It is a very great emergency. Public business is entirely suspended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to return to the bill S. 78, No. 41 on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. Is there objection to the return?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 78) authorizing the appointment of an additional judge for the district of North Dakota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the judicial district of the State of North Dakota, who shall possess the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same compensation and allowance as the present judge of said district, and the judge so appointed shall be held and treated as the senior judge and shall exercise such powers and perform such duties in that judicial district as may be incident to seniority.

SEC. 2. That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the district of North Dakota by the retirement, disqualification, or death of the judge senior in commission, such vacancy shall not be filled, and thereafter there shall be but one district judge in said district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DYER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EXTENDING LIMIT OF INDEBTEDNESS, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the speech of Mr. DE VEYRA, one of the Commissioners from the Philippine Islands, on the bill to increase the limit of indebtedness of the Philippine Islands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the Resident Commissioner of the Philippine Islands, Mr. DE VEYRA, may print in the RECORD a speech on the increase of the limit of indebtedness of the Philippine Islands. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the speech referred to:

SPEECH OF MR. DE VEYRA.

Mr. Speaker, there is very little to add to the report of the committee on the measure extending the limit of indebtedness of the Philippine Islands now before the House. The report is almost an exhaustive presentation of the circumstances that makes the passage of this measure imperative.

I wish only to say that both the people and the government of the Philippine Islands are behind the legislative project. They are desirous to see it approved without unnecessary delay. In fact, this bill was presented here on their request. We, the Resident Commissioners, were explicitly instructed to advocate its passage, and I have so stated to the committee during the two hearings on the bill.

It might be claimed that on principle the enactment of this law is unwise. Some distinguished Members of the House are of this opinion. I have been asked whether the increase in the public indebtedness of the Philippine Islands would not result in a durable economic tie between our country and yours that might affect unfavorably the question of our independence, since the bonds to be issued would have to be sold in this country.

I believe that this argument is not tenable. The bill before the House is merely an amendment to the Jones law or autonomy act of August 29, 1916. It does not seek to alter the fundamental principle of the Jones law. The Philippine Government is still empowered to incur indebtedness. Instead, however, of making the limit of that indebtedness only $15,000,000, the present measure seeks to raise the limit to $30,000,000. Philippine trade and industrial activities, generally, have developed to such a degree that makes the increase of our indebtedness absolutely essential. The present limitation of $15,000,000 was fixed at a time when the foreign trade and currency in circulation in the Philippines were about one-third their present size. We need ample leeways for our unprecedented development.

Neither does the present proposed amendment to the Jones law react on the independence question. The consistent policy of the United States with regard to the Philippine Islands remains unimpaired. It is still the case that a more autonomous government is to be in operation in the islands as a step toward the concession of that independence which is expressly promised in the autonomy act.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, and I do not hesitate to state here, that before the policy of the United States as regards the Philippine Islands has been so defined, the Filipinos have looked with apprehension at every American dollar invested in the Philippines. Since the passage of the Jones law, however, this attitude underwent a radical change. We no longer are aroused to suspect that every American dollar invested in the Philippines might be a nail driven into the coffin of our independence. We have confidence now in American capital; we entertain good will toward American investors, and we invite American business men to do business in the islands.

In short, we believe that notwithstanding the opposition of vested interests created in the islands in favor of Americans, the promise made for and on behalf of the American people by their chosen representatives must stand as the unalterable policy of the American Nation—the plighted troth that you are in honor bound to live up to. We know that the element of trade will not be permitted to enter into any consideration of our freedom. We know too that the American people will not permit the honor of the Nation to be measured in terms of dollars and cents. I emphatically repeat that we have faith in the spirit of liberty of the American people and their Congress; we have faith in the fulfillment of your promise to grant us independence; and, with this faith, we refuse to look upon American money as the arch enemy of our freedom; we prefer to look upon it as an unselfish factor in the development of our natural resources—something that makes your policy of altruism all the more resplendent. It is in this sense that we prefer American capital to any other foreign element of our economic development. It is in this sense too that we have willingly aligned our interests with those of America. We believe that American capital as well as the American Government, in their simultaneous reach across the Pacific, are actuated by the same benign motive—the setting up of a republic, at once prosperous and respected, that will reflect credit on the Mother Republic.

So sure was the Philippine Legislature that there would be no danger involved in the enactment of this bill that, anticipating favorable action by Congress, it had passed at its last session a law authorizing the War Department of the United States, in accordance with the usual practice, to negotiate for the sale of the bonds which will be floated upon the approval of this law.

The Philippine government can sustain an indebtedness that is even much heavier than the limit set by this bill. The estimated value of our resources reaches into the billions and the total receipts of the Philippine government, according to the last yearly report of the insular auditor, is almost a hundred million pesos. Our present indebtedness also is much less than the indebtedness of almost all of the small independent countries of the world. It is less than that of Argentina, that of Belgium, Bolivia, Bulgaria, Chile, and Denmark. Ecuador, Norway, Peru, Rumania, and Switzerland also have a greater indebtedness than the Philippine Islands.

The report of the committee also shows that the measure now under consideration is of such an emergency nature that it should appeal to the sympathy of the Members of this distinguished body. The best reason for its immediate enactment is the present economic condition prevailing in the archipelago. For besides the urgent needs of public improvements there is also the vital necessity of placing sufficient gold funds in this country in order to stabilize the exchange market and to restore the parity of the Philippine peso.

Before the present trade crisis throughout the world ensued, trade between the United States and the Philippines was increasing steadily. Last year's importations and exportations between the United States and the Philippines have reached over 60 per cent of the total Philippine trade. Due to the general crisis, however, that is now being felt, and with the abrupt lowering of prices of all commodities, the foreign commerce of the islands has been so affected that our trade with this country is only a little short of being virtually paralyzed. Consequently, the value of our money has depreciated as has every other money in the world, with the possible exception of the Japanese yen. The rate of exchange has gradually increased, to the detriment of the Philippine peso, resulting in the impairment of American trade with the islands.

The government of the Philippine Islands, under the inspiration and guidance of the Government at Washington, years ago proceeded to make reforms in our monetary system in order to alleviate the unstable situation of exchange, and has practically given to the public assurances of its financial stability. Both Governments, therefore, are under a moral duty to provide means of relief, and so far as human eye can see, under the present circumstances, the immediate adoption of the measure now under consideration is the only effective remedy.

Mr. Speaker, I emphasize that it is not only in the interest of my country, but just as much in the interest of American trade in the Philippines, that I strongly urge the enactment of this measure without unnecessary delay.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

CLERKS AND DEPUTY CLERKS TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3205) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1921.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may we have it reported?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That that portion of the fifth paragraph under the heading "United States courts," in section 1 of an act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1921, reading as follows, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: "Provided further, That no clerk or deputy clerk or assistant in the office of the clerk of a United States district court shall receive any compensation or emoluments through any office or position to which he may be appointed by the court other than that received as such clerk, deputy clerk, or assistant, whether from the United States or from private litigants."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Wisconsin withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves the right to object.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement in regard to this measure.

One of the reasons why this bill was introduced and acted upon favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary is because in many of the States, particularly in the larger States of the West that are not subdivided into judicial districts, the Federal courts sit in a number of places. It is necessary for the clerk of the court to have deputies at these places. Under the provision contained in the last legislative bill the Government will have to dispense with the services of these deputies, and every time court meets in one of these outlying places it will be under the necessity of paying the mileage and expenses of deputies sent from the headquarters clerk's office to the place where the court sits. In my State, for example, the headquarters of the Federal court are in the city of Portland. There are two terms of court held in Pendleton, in eastern Oregon, 225 miles distant from Portland. There are also two terms of the Federal court each year held in Medford, 325 miles south of Portland toward the California line. It is for the best interests of the court and for the best interests of the orderly transaction of business that the clerk have deputies residing in Pendleton and in Medford who will stay there all the time, getting the papers ready and having things in shape for the sessions of court. It is impossible to secure the services of deputies in these towns, on the salary that is allowed, if they are prohibited from doing other work; and if this bill or some similar bill does not pass this Congress, then we will be under the necessity of dispensing with the services of these men, and the clerk of the court will have to send deputies from the headquarters of the court, at great expense to the Government. I think this bill ought to pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, the provision carried in the sundry civil bill which it is sought to repeal was modified at the suggestion of the Department of Justice, because they thought it was too broad, in the deficiency appropriation act that has now become a law. The provision in that act excepts deputy and assistant clerks where the emoluments do not exceed $2,000 a year. That, in the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations, met the difficulty cited by the gentleman from Oregon. For that reason I object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. McARTHUR. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. STAFFORD. In view of the fact that we have modified the law at the suggestion of the Department of Justice, I see no reason why this bill should continue on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill may be passed without prejudice. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 59. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to protect certain restricted members of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes;

S. 904. An act fixing the term of service of Elijah C. Putnam during the war;

S. 732. An act to extend the provisions of section 2455, Revised Statutes, to the lands within the abandoned Fort Buford Military Reservation, in the States of North Dakota and Montana; and

S. 834. An act to authorize the appointment of an ordnance storekeeper in the Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 5616) granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Venango County, their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Allegheny River in the State of Pennsylvania.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 834. An act to authorize the appointment of an ordnance storekeeper in the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 904. An act for the relief of Elijah C. Putnam; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 732. An act to extend the provisions of section 2455, Revised Statutes, to the lands within the abandoned Fort Buford Military Reservation in the States of North Dakota and Montana; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. J. Res. 59. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to protect certain restricted members of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

FLOOD CONTROL SURVEY OF THE YAZOO RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5651) to survey the Yazoo River, Miss., with a view to the control of its floods.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the measure?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] whether under the general law the House Committee on Flood Control would not have authority to call upon the commission for a survey, as provided in this bill?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; they will not. Under the law the Rivers and Harbors Committee might do that, but when we passed the flood control act of March 1, 1917, we changed that provision in so far as it related to surveys for flood control, for this reason: A preliminary survey may be ordered to determine whether or not a river is worthy of improvement for the purposes of navigation. If the Chief of Engineers upon that preliminary survey thinks favorably of the proposition he orders a survey. Now, a survey for the purposes of determining questions of flood control would frequently involve a considerably larger outlay of money than an ordinary survey for navigation purposes; and so, that being true, we thought that the Chief of Engineers ought not to have that power, and we provided in the act that on all preliminary surveys the report should be made to Congress setting forth what the survey would cost, so that Congress might pass on that proposition, rather than to leave it to the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has had considerable acquaintance with this subject and had a large part in passing the original flood control bill. I direct his attention to the last paragraph of section 3:

All examinations and reports which may now be made by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors upon request by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors relating to works or projects of navigation shall, in like manner, be made upon request of the Committee on Flood Control on all works and projects relating to flood control.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes; but the law does not authorize the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, by resolution, to order a preliminary survey.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the purpose of the paragraph I have just read? I thought that language was broad enough to authorize the Committee on Flood Control to provide for surveys.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No. Under the law now the Chief of Engineers can not make any supplemental report to the committee or to Congress after he has once made a report, unless there is a resolution passed by the committee requesting him to give that information.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire whether the Yazoo River is considered, under the general terms of the flood control act, as a part of the Mississippi River project?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; it is not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is that the reason why the gentleman desires this special legislation?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes. The Yazoo River is not a part of the Mississippi River project at all. The Mississippi River Commission has jurisdiction of the Yazoo Canal, as it is called, which is simply a short canal running up from the Mississippi River where there was a cut-off, the Centennial as it is called, in front of Vicksburg, perhaps 3 or 4 miles long. That part of it was put under the Mississippi River Commission, but the Yazoo River and its tributaries run up three or four hundred miles and the Mississippi River Commission has no jurisdiction over it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The passage of this bill will not commit the Government to a broader policy as to flood control than has heretofore been adopted?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Oh, no. This simply asks the Chief of Engineers to tell us what a survey would cost; that is all. He has the data in his office and he can make the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary examination and survey to be made of the Yazoo River, Miss., with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1917.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. HUMPHREYS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF WEST VIRGINIA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 694) providing for the appointment of an additional judge for the southern district of the State of West Virginia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint an additional judge of the district court of the United States for the southern judicial district of the State of West Virginia, who shall possess the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same compensation and allowance as the present judge of said district, and the judge so appointed shall be held and treated as the senior judge and shall exercise such powers and perform such duties in that judicial district as may be incident to seniority.

SEC. 2. That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the southern district of West Virginia senior in commission such vacancy shall not be filled, and thereafter there shall be but one district judge in said district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GOODYKOONTZ, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TRANSPORTATION FROM EUROPE FOR DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1019) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish free transportation and subsistence from Europe to the United States for certain destitute discharged soldiers and their wives and children.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I notice that the authority limiting this act is contained in the proviso in the original bill and although it might be construed to apply to the second section I suggest that it would be better to take the proviso out and have the provision come in as a new section at the end of the bill. I have no objection to the substance of the bill.

Mr. KAHN. I shall have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to furnish transportation on United States Army transports from Europe to the United States, and subsistence en route, to any person who served in the Army of the United States and was honorably discharged therefrom in Europe, and who is now in Europe and is or becomes destitute, and to the wife and children of such person: Provided further, That if such person, his wife or children, are not at a port of embarkation of United States Army transports in Europe the Secretary of War is further authorized to furnish transportation to such person, his wife, or children, to such port of embarkation and subsistence en route: Provided further, That all such transportation and subsistence shall be furnished without cost to such person, his wife, or children: And provided further, That the authority conferred by this act shall cease and determine six months after the approval thereof.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1 line 9, after the word "person," insert: "and transportation and subsistence en route to such person and his wife and children from point of debarkation in the United States to the point of enlistment of such person or his home of record or to any other point to which he may desire to be furnished transportation for himself, wife, and children: Provided, That such point is of no greater distance from the point of debarkation than is his point of enlistment or home."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "transport" insert the words "in Europe."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, strike out the word "all."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 13, after the word "furnished" insert "to such person, his wife and children."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "to" strike out "such person, his wife or children," and insert "them."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "them," strike out the colon and insert a period, and strike out the last proviso, beginning on line 14.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, insert a new section, section 2, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized to furnish transportation and subsistence en route, as contemplated above in the case of destitute former soldiers in Europe, to any person who was honorably discharged from the Army of the United States in Siberia and who is now in Vladivostok or its immediate vicinity and is or becomes destitute, and to the wife and children of such person: Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized, in transporting such persons to the United States, to procure transportation and subsistence for them on vessels other than United States Army transports from Siberia to Japan."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, to follow section 2, as section 3.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD. Page 3, after line 2, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the authority conferred by this act shall cease and determine six months after the approval thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the title by inserting after the word "Europe" the words "and Siberia,"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KAHN moves to amend the title by inserting after the word "Europe" the words "and Siberia."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

USE OF CERTAIN TITLES ON TABLETS AND OTHER MEMORIALS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5013) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the use of certain titles on tablets and other memorials.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to sanction the use upon monuments, tablets, or other memorials erected to persons who have died or may hereafter die from wounds, injuries, or disease incurred in the line of duty while members of the naval service, of the designation of the rank for which qualified and to whom appointments to such ranks would have been issued in due course except for their death.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BIOLOGICAL STATION IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1475) providing for a grant of land to the State of Washington for a biological station and general research purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title and fee to portions of sections 1, 2, 11, and 12 of township 35 north, of range 3 west of the Willamette meridian, being a military reservation at San Juan Island, in the county of San Juan, State of Washington, containing about 484 acres, be, and the same are hereby, granted to the State of Washington for the use of the University of Washington, for the purpose of a biological station and for general university research purposes; subject, however, to the right of the United States to at any and all times and in any manner assume control of, hold, use, and occupy without license, consent, or leave from said State or university any or all of said land for any and all military, naval, or lighthouse purposes, freed from any conveyances, charges, encumbrances, or liens made, created, permitted, or sanctioned thereon by said State or university: Provided, That the United States shall not be or become liable for any damages or compensation whatever to the said State of Washington or the University of Washington for any future use by the Government of any or all of the above-described land for any of the above-mentioned purposes: Provided further, That if said lands shall not be used for the purposes hereinabove mentioned, the same or such parts thereof not so used shall revert to the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HADLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SURVEY OF CALAVERAS RIVER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1269) to make a preliminary survey of the Calaveras River in California, with a view to the control of floods.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I take it that this is more or less a companion bill to that just passed relating to the Yazoo River?

Mr. CURRY. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire whether the passage of this bill will impose any policy on the National Government in respect to flood control in the Calaveras River?

Mr. CURRY. It will not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not acquainted with the geography of California sufficiently to know whether the Calaveras is in any way a tributary to the Sacramento River, which the general flood act covers. Can the gentleman give the information?

Mr. CURRY. The Calaveras River is a tributary of the San Joaquin River, south of the Sacramento. It is in the San Joaquin Valley and rises in the Sierra Nevada Mountains and flows into the San Joaquin River through Mormon Channel, by the city of Stockton.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I read the report, the Government has done some work of a public nature in providing a canal along the Stockton Mormon Channel.

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. So as to prevent erosion and the filling up of the stream.

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And this is more or less a supplement of that project?

Mr. CURRY. To a certain extent; yes. Last fall the Board of Army Engineers for Rivers and Harbors and the Assistant Chief of Engineers, Col. Taylor, were at Stockton and spent two days there. They examined the diverting canal and the San Joaquin and the Calaveras Rivers.

There is a project for the survey of the San Joaquin, which was reported from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and it was supposed that when that was passed there was sufficient authority to include the survey of the Calaveras. Most of the floods of the San Joaquin are caused by the Calaveras. The San Joaquin silts up with the erosion from the Calaveras floods. The assistant chief of engineers and the board did not think that they had sufficient authority to perform this preliminary survey, although they wished to do it very much. I therefore introduced this bill to give them the authority. The War Department has all of the information and records necessary to make the preliminary survey and report. It will not cost the Government anything, and probably even if the work should be authorized, under the policy of the War Department all of the expense would be borne by the city of Stockton, the county of San Joaquin, and the State of California, together with the owners of the lands affected by the floods, which without the survey demonstrates that the navigation interests of the San Joaquin would justify Federal cooperation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a preliminary survey to be made of the Calaveras River in California with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River and the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1917.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURRY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLEARWATER, ST. JOE, AND SELWAY NATIONAL FORESTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 77) for the consolidation of forest lands within the Clearwater, St. Joe, and Selway National Forests.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman who is in charge of the bill to let the bill go over for this time. I do not like to go into the reasons now, but I think I could easily convince the gentleman why it ought to go over.

Mr. FRENCH. Possibly the objections that are in the gentleman's mind may be explained away.

Mr. RAKER. Unless the gentleman amends his bill clear through he can not explain them away.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I shall be compelled to acquiesce in the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only question is, Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. Can a gentleman, sitting in his seat, make a demand for the regular order?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise and make the demand for the regular order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman let it go over?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois rises and demands the regular order. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. I shall have to object unless the gentleman wants to let it go over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California objects and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the bill retain its place on the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GAS AND ELECTRIC LIGHT SERVICE, COUNTY OF MAUI, HAWAII.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6673) granting a franchise for the purpose of manufacturing and supplying gas and electric current in the districts of Wailuku and Makawao, county of Maui, Territory of Hawaii.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this bill the approval of the Delegate, the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE]?

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. It has the approval of the Delegate from Hawaii. The bill has also been passed by the governor and is now here for the approval of the Congress of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6673) granting a franchise for the purpose of manufacturing and supplying gas and electric current in the districts of Wailuku and Makawao, county of Maui, Territory of Hawaii.

MANUFACTURE AND SUPPLY OF GAS AND ELECTRICITY.

Be it enacted, etc., That D. C. Lindsay, of Kahului, county of Maui, Territory of Hawaii, his associates, successors, and assigns, or such corporation as he or them shall cause to be incorporated under the laws of the Territory of Hawaii, and its successors and assigns (he and they being hereinafter referred to as the association), are hereby authorized and empowered to manufacture, sell, furnish, and supply electric current for light and power purposes and gas for use as fuel, for illuminating purposes, and other purposes, which the association may deem advisable, in the districts of Wailuku and Makawao, county of Maui, for the term of 50 years from the date of the approval of this act by the Congress of the United States, subject to the limitations in this act contained.

ERECTION OF BUILDINGS, ETC.

SEC. 2. That the association shall have the right to erect, construct, operate, and maintain at such place, within the limits mentioned in section 1, as the board of supervisors of the county of Maui shall approve, such buildings, machinery, and appurtenances, and such poles, lines, wires, cables, lamp-posts, conductors, and such other appliances as may be necessary for the production, manufacture, and storage and distribution of gas and the transmission, distribution, and supply of electric current to the consumer thereof, together with its various by-products, as may be required from time to time during the existence of the rights hereby granted.

PIPES, WIRES, POLES, LINES, CONDUITS, ETC., IN AND OVER HIGHWAYS.

SEC. 3. That the association, for the purpose of distributing such gas and electric current, shall have the right from time to time to lay pipes or other conduits and erect poles, lines, wires, cables, lamps, lamp-posts, conductors, and conduits in, under, or over the streets, roads, and public places in the said districts of Wailuku and Makawao, and whenever supply pipes and mains, lines, conduits, and conductors shall be laid connection shall be made and pipes shall be laid from said mains and lines to the property line of the highway for the purpose of supplying gas to the property holders adjoining such street, and each of such connections shall be with stopcocks inside of such property line: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the laying down of additional branches or connections at any time when future requirements render the same necessary. But the methods by which such streets, roads, and places are to be used shall be subject to rules, regulations, and approval of the board of supervisors, and all instructions and directions made by said board shall be strictly followed to the end that the general public shall be inconvenienced as little as possible: And provided also, That whenever any street, road, or other place shall be excavated and holes or trenches made therein for laying, maintaining, replacing, or repairing such pipes, conduits, or connections, or poles, lines, or conductors, such holes or trenches shall be safeguarded and refilled as soon as possible, and the pavement, if any, and such street, road, or other place shall be replaced in good order and like condition by the association: Provided, That if such repair or restoration shall not be made to the satisfaction of the board of supervisors within a reasonable time whereof they shall be the judge, they may cause it to be done at the expense of the association: And provided further, That the association may be required to furnish to the board of supervisors, before making any street excavation or alteration, a good and sufficient bond for a sum to be fixed by the board of supervisors to insure prompt replacement of such portions of the streets and pavements therefor.

METER; RATES.

SEC. 4. That the association shall also have the right to maintain and use gas and electric meters or other means for measuring the amount of gas and electric current used from time to time and in such places as may be deemed necessary, and to operate the same for all purposes connected with the use of such gas and electric current, and shall also have the right to charge, receive, and collect from all consumers of gas and/or electric current reasonable prices as it may from time to time fix and determine: Provided, however, That the prices charged to all consumers substantially under the same conditions and circumstances shall be equal; and said association shall also have the right to charge consumers or intended consumers of gas and/or electric current for the cost and expense of making connections between the mains and premises where such gas and electric current is to be used, and may also include the price for all connections, pipes, gas fixtures, wires, cables, and other materials necessary.

CUTTING OFF SERVICE.

SEC. 5. That the association shall also have the right to cut off the supply of gas and electric current from any consumer who shall refuse or fail to pay amounts due for gas or electric current so supplied by the association within such reasonable time as may be fixed for payment of the same; but such cutting off shall not prevent the association from using any remedies now or which may hereafter be authorized by law for collecting debts.

SEC. 6. That the rights and powers hereby granted shall be exercised in such manner as to cause the least inconvenience to the public, and the association shall provide gas of the best quality obtainable, which quality shall be subject to the control of such reasonable rules and regulations as the public utilities commission shall from time to time deem necessary, and current of proper and sufficient voltage and amperage, and the buildings and machinery, with all appurtenances to be erected, and general plant to be maintained in connection therewith, together with the offices, books, and accounts of the association, shall be open to examination and inspection at all times by the public utilities commission of the Territory of Hawaii and the board of supervisors, or some one duly authorized by them for that purpose.

TIME OF COMMENCING WORK.

SEC. 7. That it is further provided that the rights hereby granted shall cease and determine if operations hereunder are not commenced by beginning the construction of buildings or other works for manufacturing or supplying such gas, or by laying pipes or conduits in any of the streets, roads, or places and installing machinery or making suitable arrangements for the supply of electric current and purchase, erection, and installation of poles, lines, wires, and cables within two years from and after the date of approval of this act by the Congress of the United States; and also if sufficient works are not completed and in operation to supply gas and electric current, and if gas and electric current is not supplied within two years after such commencement.

MORTGAGES; BONDS.

SEC. 8. That the association shall have power to mortgage the franchise hereby conferred to secure the payment of bonds or other monetary obligations incurred in the construction of buildings, machinery, pipes, conduits, poles, lines, wires, cables, and conductors and appurtenances, and the manufacturing and supplying of gas and electric current as provided by this act.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION.

SEC. 9. That all property of every kind and nature forming or used as part of such gas and electric system, including this franchise, shall be exempt from any and all taxes under the Territory of Hawaii until the expiration of five years from and after the date of approval of this act by the Congress of the United States: Provided, however, That if the association shall purchase or otherwise acquire the property and/or franchise of the Maui Electric Co. (Ltd.), an Hawaiian corporation now carrying on the business of producing and selling electric light and power in the county of Maui, the property so purchased or otherwise acquired shall not be entitled to the tax exemption herein provided for.

PAYMENT TO THE COUNTY OF MAUI.

SEC. 10. That one month after the expiration of each calendar year there shall be payable to the treasurer of the county of Maui, for and on behalf of said county, 2½ per cent of the gross receipts of the association for all gas and electric current furnished to consumers under the terms of this act during the preceding 12 calendar months.

SEC. 11. That the association shall, within one month after the expiration of each calendar year, file with the board of supervisors a detailed statement showing all of its receipts and expenditures during the preceding calendar year.

RIGHT TO ACQUIRE PROPERTY, LIMITATIONS.

SEC. 12. That the said association shall have the right to acquire, hold, or take over, either by purchase or lease, property both real and personal, or mixed, and such other property as may be deemed necessary or essential for the proper conduct of its business, but said association shall not have the power or right to purchase the franchise and/or property of any other company of like nature, except with the approval of the public utilities commission.

SEC. 13. That this franchise may at any time be amended or repealed by the Congress of the United States or by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii with the approval of the Congress of the United States; and the rights, privileges, and powers by this act conferred shall not be construed to be exclusive.

SEC. 14. That the Territory of Hawaii, the county of Maui, or any political subdivision thereof, within or including the districts of Wailuku and Makawao, may at any time after the expiration of 20 years from the date of the passage of this act by the Congress of the United States, and upon six months' notice in writing to the association, given pursuant to proper authority, acquire by purchase all the property of the association, subject to the then existing charges thereon. The amount to be paid to the association for such purpose shall be determined by the public utilities commission; but such amount shall in no case exceed the actual cost or the actual value of the tangible property or the actual cost of reproducing or replacing it, less depreciation and less the charges thereon. The value of the franchise or good will or any other intangible element shall not be considered in determining the amount to be paid.

Either the association or the purchaser may appeal to the Supreme Court of Hawaii from the decision of such commission by filing a written notice of appeal with the commission within five days after the decision is rendered. It shall thereupon be the duty of the commission immediately to certify up to the supreme court the record of its proceedings, showing in such certificate the valuation claimed by the association, the valuation claimed by the purchaser, and the valuation as determined by the commission. Such certificates shall be accompanied by copies of all papers, documents, and evidence upon which the decision of the commission was based, and a copy of such decision. Upon any such appeal the supreme court may in its behalf take or require further evidence to be introduced by either party.

Within six months after the determination of the purchase price as aforesaid the same shall be paid to the association, and thereupon the franchise granted hereby shall cease and determine, and all the property of said association shall become the property of such purchaser without any further conveyance; but said association shall make all such further conveyances as may be desired by the purchaser and approved by said commission or said court of appeal.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

SEC. 15. That this franchise, and the person or corporation holding the same, shall be subject as to reasonableness of rates, prices, and charges, and in all other respects, to the provisions of chapter 128 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, and amendments thereto, creating a public utilities commission in the Territory of Hawaii.

SEC. 16. That the public utilities commission of the Territory of Hawaii is hereby granted power to order the company to make extensions of its service lines whenever it shall be made to appear that said extension is a public necessity and that the total plant of the company, including such extension or extensions, can be made to earn a reasonable profit on the cost and maintenance of the same: Provided, That all orders of the public utilities commission herein provided for shall be subject to review by the courts of the Territory as provided by law.

SEC. 17. That this act shall take effect and be law from and after the date of its approval by the governor of the Territory of Hawaii, subject, however, to the approval of the Congress, to be secured within two years from the date of such approval by the governor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, as the committee amendments are all of an informal character, striking out the titles to the various sections, they may be considered at one time and voted upon en bloc.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, line 3, strike out the words "Manufacture and supply of gas and electricity."

On page 2, line 6, strike out the words "Erection of buildings, etc."

On page 2, lines 19 and 20, strike out the words "Pipes, wires, poles, lines, conduits, etc., in and over highways."

On page 4, line 9, strike out the words "Meter; rates."

On page 5, line 3, strike out the words "Cutting off service."

On page 6, line 1, strike out the words "Time of commencing work."

On page 6, line 16, strike out the words "Mortgages; bonds."

On page 6, line 24, strike out the words "Exemption from taxation."

On page 7, line 12, strike out the words "Payment to the county of Maui."

On page 7, line 24, strike out the words "Right to acquire property, limitations."

On page 10, line 1, strike out the words "Public Utilities Commission."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. In the bill I think there are some obvious typographical errors. I did not follow the reading by the Clerk to see whether or not it was the same in the bill that was read. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman having the bill in charge. For instance, on page 4, line 17, there appears both the conjunctive and the disjunctive, and the same instance in line 22 on the same page, and again on page 7, line 6, where the same language occurs; also again on page 8, line 4. I wish to inquire what was the purpose of using both the conjunctive and the disjunctive, or is that a typographical error?

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. This is the bill as it passed the Legislature of Hawaii. It has not been changed a bit except as amended here by striking out the subtitle.

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct the gentleman's attention to the first instance that I called his attention, on page 4, line 17. The phraseology is as follows:

And shall also have the right to charge, receive, and collect from all consumers of gas and/or electric current reasonable prices.

What does it mean, with the conjunctive and the disjunctive?

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. This provides for the manufacture and sale of gas, or both.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it is the purpose to have both the conjunctive and the disjunctive, I can then see that there may be some purpose in it. I do not recall of ever seeing a bill framed where the language is used as it is here, both in the conjunctive and disjunctive.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think it means a person may use both gas and electricity or may use one of them.

Mr. STAFFORD. With that explanation, it has a meaning.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have seen it used in that way, but I think not in a bill before.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. On one or two occasions during the last term of Congress we passed bills using this form.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not up with the modern methods as introduced in the last Congress, but, of course, having obtained the information, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CREDIT TO DISBURSING CLERK, BUREAU WAR RISK INSURANCE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution No. 31, authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire of the gentleman having the bill in charge, whether it is purposed to legalize by this bill payment of insurance in the coming fiscal year where the premiums have not been kept up?

Mr. SWEET. It is not. It is simply a question of bookkeeping, and to get by the question of a certificate which is required by the Auditor for the Treasury Department to the effect that all premium payments due to date of death have been paid. In many instances it has been impossible to get a certificate that the insurance premiums have been paid, although they know positively they have been paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand it, the insurance will not be paid to any beneficiary unless the premiums have been paid?

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the insurer is in good standing?

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation of the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I still want to ask the gentleman from Iowa if the payments of premiums are in arrears how does the War Risk Insurance Bureau ascertain that the policy is still in force?

Mr. SWEET. The situation is this: While the boys were over in Europe the insurance premiums were taken out of their pay. Now, that was certain. In order to get that evidence before the Auditor for the Treasury Department it takes time. They are sure it was paid, because the soldier was in the Army and it was being taken out of his pay.

Mr. BLACK. What I wanted to be sure about is that the War Risk Insurance Director in each and every one of these cases definitely ascertained that the deduction has been made?

Mr. SWEET. Yes; he does. And for the reason just given he is not in a position to present a certificate to that effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 31) authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases.

Resolved, etc., That for such reasonable time as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not extending beyond the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for all payments of insurance installments heretofore or hereafter made under the provisions of article 4 of the war risk insurance act in advance of the verification of the deduction on the pay rolls or of the payment otherwise of all premiums.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SWEET, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

NO QUORUM.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that we have not a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

CONDITIONS IN THE COAL FIELDS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business and proceed with Senate resolution 80, directing the Committee on Education and Labor to investigate the recent acts of violence in the coal fields of West Virginia and adjacent territory, and the causes which led to the conditions which now exist in that territory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Reserving for a moment the right to object, may I ask the Senator from California how long he expects it will take to dispose of his resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think it will take a very few minutes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think we ought to have a quorum here. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McNary	Spencer
Ball	Harreld	Moses	Stanley
Borah	Harris	Nelson	Sutherland
Brandegee	Harrison	New	Swanson

Fernald	Lenroot	Shields	Williams
Fletcher	McCumber	Shortridge	Willis
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Simmons	Wolcott
Gerry	McKinley	Smith
Glass	McLean	Smoot

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I withdraw temporarily the request that I made just before the call for a quorum in order that the conference report on the Army appropriation bill may be proceeded with.

THE MILK INDUSTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution 431, agreed to March 1, 1919, a report of that commission on milk and milk products in the United States during the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

FUNERALS OF TWO RAINBOW DIVISION VETERANS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from J. Bentley Mulford, of the District of Columbia Chapter, Rainbow Division Veterans, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

JUNE 22, 1921.

Hon. CALVIN COOLIDGE,
President of the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The District of Columbia Chapter of the Rainbow Division Veterans extends to the Members of the Senate an invitation to attend the funeral services of the late Mortimer H. Jordan, captain Company K, One hundred and sixty-seventh (Fourth Alabama) Infantry, Forty-second (Rainbow) Division, and of the late Corpl. He also presented two petitions of sundry citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying for the calling of an international disarmament conference, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Young Women's Christian Association, of Jackson, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the protection of maternity and infancy, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions of the Women's Auxiliary, Unit No. 176, American Legion, of Clinton; Marlette Post, No. 162, American Legion, of Marlette; Wyandotte Council, No. 1802, Knights of Columbus, of Wyandotte; Women's Auxiliary of W. T. Leenhouts Post, No. 6, of Holland; and Ahlmeek Lodge, No. 150, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of Ishpeming, all in the State of Michigan, favoring the enactment of legislation providing adequate relief for disabled ex-service men, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
FIFTY-FIRST LEGISLATURE.

Senate concurrent resolution 4, relative to conditions in Mexico.

Whereas there has existed in the past in our neighboring Republic of Mexico a period of revolution, bloodshed, and misunderstanding in which life, liberty, and commerce were at all times in jeopardy; and

Whereas in an election recently held in that Republic there was elected to the Presidency the most honorable, Gen. Alvara Obregon, a man of the people who has devoted himself most vigorously to the task of bringing order out of chaos: and

Whereas President Obregon enjoys the entire respect, confidence, and whole-hearted backing of all classes of his countrymen; and

Whereas a new era of peace, prosperity, and friendly relationship has been brought about by his excellency, President Obregon; and

Whereas the people of the great State of Michigan are overjoyed at the splendid manner in which President Obregon is directing the affairs of his country, and therefore the State of Michigan joins her sister States in a formal expression of friendship to the people of Mexico, and commendation and confidence in President Obregon: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Michigan declares itself to be most pleased with the election of and the administration by President Obregon, and takes pleasure in congratulating the people of Mexico upon the new era of peace and prosperity, and particularly for the friendly relationships which have been established: And be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives are hereby directed to forward copies of this resolution to the President of the Senate of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of Michigan's Senators and Representatives in Congress: And be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives be, and are hereby, directed to send to President Obregon a copy of this resolution.

Adopted by the senate, June 2, 1921.

DENNIS E. ALWARD,
Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted by the house of representatives, June 2, 1921.

CHARLES S. PIERCE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. NELSON presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 9, in the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, fifth session.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled, and to the Secretary of the Interior:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully represent that—

"Whereas the city of Juneau is the present capital of Alaska, and there are no government-owned buildings at Juneau suitable for the many offices of the government, all such offices, except that of the governor, now being quartered in rented apartments and scattered through the various parts of the city, whereby they are inconvenient and inadequate for the public service and are a great expense to the government, as the aggregate rentals for such offices amount to about $25,000 per year, and the rented quarters lack vaults for the safe-keeping of valuable government documents and records, so that such records and papers are in constant danger of destruction; and

"Whereas all of the general government offices of the Territory of Alaska should be located in one building or group of buildings, suitably constructed and containing vaults for the safe-keeping of all public documents and records; and

"Whereas since the location of the capital of Alaska at the city of Juneau conditions in the Territory have greatly changed as to industry and population, and by the construction of Government roads and railroads, rendering necessary, before the expenditure of any money in or upon a permanent capital building, a reexamination of the question as to the place where the capital of Alaska is to be finally and permanently located, so that it may be located at the most advantageous place for the people of Alaska and for the transaction of the government business; and

"Whereas the Congress of the United States could act with greater knowledge and more definite information upon this subject if a congressional committee were appointed and sent to Alaska to investigate and report as to the best place for the location of the permanent capital of the Territory: Now, therefore

"We, your memorialists, respectfully urge that the Congress appoint a special congressional committee to visit Alaska during the summer of the year 1921, and that such committee examine into the question as to the most advantageous place for the permanent location of the capital of Alaska, and that upon receiving the report of such committee, or upon such other advice and information as the Congress may require, that one of the cities of Alaska be designated as the permanent location of its capital, and that in such city a suitable capitol building be erected or dedicated to that purpose.

"And your memorialists will so ever pray."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 574) to amend an act entitled "An act to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States," as amended, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 143) thereon.

Mr. WOLCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1951) for the relief of John Hickson, jr., reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 144) thereon.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 7) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia," approved February 4, 1913, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 145) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NEWBERRY:

A bill (S. 2129) to establish additional fish-cultural subsidiary stations in the State of Michigan; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 2130) changing the name of Vernon Street in the county of Washington, D. C., to U Street; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 2131) to extend for the period of seven months the provisions of Title II of "The food control and the District of Columbia rents act," approved October 22, 1919, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 2132) to amend section 1 of an act entitled "An act to incorporate Gonzaga College, in the city of Washington and District of Columbia"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO INTERSTATE HIGHWAY BILL.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1355) to provide for the establishment, construction, and maintenance of a post roads and interstate highway system, to create a Federal highway commission, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Army appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5010) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The conference report will be read.

The reading clerk read the report as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5010) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4, 6, 11, 15, 16, 19, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 32, 34, 37, 42, 44, 53, 56, and 57.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 8, 14, 17, 18, 20, 28, 29, 30, 31, 33, 39, 43, 47, 48, and 49, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$110,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$80,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$225,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "or not to exceed three reserve officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department, or"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore all of the matter stricken out by said amendment with the exception of the following words in lines 20 and 21, on page 27 of the bill: ", and in any event not less than 10,000 of such animals shall be sold"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That not more than $10,000 of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of draft or pack animals or animal-drawn vehicles: Provided further"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out by said amendment, amended to read as follows: "Provided, That not to exceed $10,000 of this appropriation shall be expended for new construction work"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$110,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed on the following amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 9, 10, 12, 13, 36, 38, 41, 45, 46, 52, 54, and 55.

Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. This is not a full agreement, I understand?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not in this report. There is a message from the House, however, in which the House makes certain proposals in the way of amendments, which I intend to ask the Senate to accept later on.

Mr. NORRIS. Will that make a further conference unnecessary?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It will.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senate accepts the proposition of the House on the disagreed-to amendments, it will settle the entire controversy?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it will.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator whether amendment numbered 53, the amendment involving the Great Falls water-power provision, was sent back to the House for consideration or was the action taken without sending it back to the House?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That amendment was not sent back to the House for a separate vote. The conferees on the part of the Senate could not persuade the House conferees to take such action.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senate for a few moments on this amendment.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Nebraska refers to the Great Falls power development amendment?

Mr. NORRIS. I refer to the Great Falls water-power project amendment.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has just stated that this amendment was not sent back to the House for the action of the House on it, but that many other amendments were so sent back, and that the House had taken action on some other amendments. It seems to me that the members of the committee of conference representing the Senate on the bill owed it to the Senate to insist that the House conferees should take this amendment back to the House for action. They took other amendments back. The excuse can not be offered that they were trying to save time, because they did take quite a large number of other amendments back to the House for consideration of each particular amendment by the House.

The Great Falls power development proposition has been twice passed by the Senate, but in each instance the Senate conferees have receded and the House has never yet had an opportunity to vote separately on the proposal. On the last occasion previous to the present, when the proposition was adopted by the Senate in the preceding Congress, there was an excuse which to my mind was not sufficient, but I concede it possessed some merit, namely, that the proposition had not been considered for quite a number of years by the engineers of the War Department. The conferees on the part of the Senate, therefore, agreed to a substitute amendment, which provided that a commission should be appointed to reexamine the Great Falls project and report to this Congress.

Twenty-five thousand dollars were appropriated for that purpose. In pursuance of that authorization, which became law when the bill passed Congress and was approved by the President, $25,000 was expended for a reexamination of the project, and the same conclusion was reached as previously; a favorable recommendation was made that the power at Great Falls be developed. So when the provision looking to that end was put on the bill when it passed the Senate the project had the approval and recommendation freshly made of the engineers of the War Department after an expenditure of $25,000 for that purpose. Under those circumstances, the House never having had an opportunity to act upon the matter, it seems to me that good faith to those in the Senate who favored the proposition would require that inasmuch as the appropriation bill was going back to the House for action on other amendments, this amendment ought also to have been included and the House afforded an opportunity to vote on it. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that if the House of Representatives had a fair opportunity to vote on this proposition, after a reasonable debate it would approve it. I have been told within the last day or so by Members of the other House that they had no doubt whatever if it had been taken back to the House by the conferees, as other amendments were, that this particular Senate amendment would have been approved.

Mr. President, I notified the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs when the bill went to conference, and stated specifically to him, that it seemed to me, under the circumstances, if the House conferees would not agree to the Great Falls amendment the conferees on the part of the Senate should insist that the conferees on the part of the House should take the amendment back to the House for instructions.

There is nothing new in the matter; it is an old subject, one which has been passed upon by the Senate on two occasions; and yet, after a fresh investigation and the expenditure of $25,000 of public funds, the conferees on the part of the Senate recede, despite the fact that they are sending the very bill with other disagreements back to the House for the consideration of the House. I submit, Mr. President, that is not fair.

If the House refuses to agree to the amendment, if the House after reasonable debate and consideration of the proposal to develop the Great Falls water power will not agree to it, of course, I could have nothing further to say; but I do protest, after the Senate has twice adopted the proposition, after we have just spent $25,000 for reinvestigation, the bill having to go back to the House in any event for consideration of other amendments, that it is not just or fair that the Senate conferees under those circumstances should recede and, in connection with the House conferees, absolutely deny to the House of Representatives an opportunity to pass on the question.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Can the Senator give us any information as to how much the Federal and the District Governments now spend in the District of Columbia for electrical power, including coal used in the generation of power at plants operated by the Government? I should like to ask the Senator further if the development of the water power at Great Falls would not involve the saving of millions of dollars to the Federal Government and to the District government?

Mr. NORRIS. That is true beyond any doubt, Mr. President. The Senator from Minnesota has touched upon the point which, to my mind, is vital—the saving of money and of coal. The report on the Great Falls project, fresh from the Engineers, sets forth that, counting labor and materials at the peak of war-time prices, on December 1, 1920, if the development of Great Falls were carried out, the price of electricity in the District of Columbia would be cut in two; the project would pay 6 per cent interest on the investment, allowing a liberal charge off for depreciation and for maintenance, and would pay back the entire expenditure in 30 years.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say the conference report had to go back anyway to conference?

Mr. NORRIS. No; not necessarily. What I said was——

Mr. OVERMAN. Did I not understand the Senator to say that the chairman of the committee was going to ask that the report be sent back in connection with some other amendments?

Mr. NORRIS. No; this is what I said: That when the conferees had the disputed amendments under consideration they did not agree as to quite a large number of them, and those amendments not agreed to were sent back to the House, to be voted on and considered by the House separately. That was done. The Great Falls amendment was not included, but the Senate conferees receded, and so, of course, it was not sent back to the House for a vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. NORRIS. If I am mistaken, I should like to be corrected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The conferees agreed upon all the amendments in conference except one.

Mr. NORRIS. That one was sent back to the House?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was; it had to be.

Mr. NORRIS. It does not make any difference about the number, so long as any one of them was going back to the House the Great Falls amendment might have gone with it. What was the number of the amendment which was sent back to the House?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was the amendment relative to the pay of enlisted men.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendment in which the Senator from Nebraska is interested is amendment numbered 53.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is the Great Falls water-power amendment. I read from the report of the conferees, on page 3, as follows:

> The committee of conference have not agreed on the following amendments of the Senate: Nos. 3, 9, 10, 12, 13, 36, 38, 41, 45, 46, 52, 54, and 55.

That is more than one.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but the Senator does not comprehend the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably the Senator from New York did not comprehend the situation to which I referred when he said the conferees had agreed on all amendments but one.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They did agree on all except one.

Mr. NORRIS. They have submitted a report to the Senate in which they state they have not agreed on 13. If there had been one more, the number would have been 14, and would have become sacred.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That report does not reflect the exact situation at all. The only item in difference between the conferees of the two Houses themselves was the amendment relative to the pay of enlisted men of the Army. The House receded on several Senate amendments each with an amendment, and under the House rules many of those had to be submitted to a separate vote of the House. They are nominally termed to be in disagreement, but the conferees had agreed upon them all. The House rules have changed the whole procedure in connection with conference reports very materially from what it was two years ago.

Mr. NORRIS. The disagreement between the Senator from New York and myself is absolutely immaterial. He concedes that the House conferees took certain amendments—or even one—back to the House. I have read the record of the House proceedings, and if Senators will turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—I do not have the date before me—in which the amendments that I have enumerated were taken up and which the conference report says are still in disagreement, they will see that the House considered them one at a time on the floor of the House, debated them, and voted on them, and had several roll calls on some of them. So if the conferees had agreed on all but one, they were certainly playing a joke on the House, because the House considered the amendments which I have enumerated in the House and took up a whole lot of time in debate and roll calls in their consideration. But, as I have said, I do not care about that. It is conceded that certain amendments in disagreement went back to the House, and it would have been just as easy to have taken amendment numbered 53 back, with whatever else the conferees did take back, if the Senate conferees had obeyed the mandate of the Senate, rather than followed their own wish as to what the legislation should be.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Recurring to the answer that the Senator made to the question propounded by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], if I understood the Senator from Nebraska he stated that in the first place if this project were carried out it would cut the present Government expense with regard to electric lighting in two in the middle; that it would pay maintenance charges, provide for depreciation, and after doing all that would in 30 years pay back the entire investment.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has left out one item. It would pay 6 per cent interest in the meantime on all the money invested.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Indeed? Now, then, there is just one question that I wanted to ask in addition.

The Senator from Nebraska stated that it would cut the present expense of the Government in two in the middle. Will the Senator state how much that represents in dollars of saving to the Government?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I stated that it would cut the price of electricity in two in the middle.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, whatever it is.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say, Mr. President, that, as Senators know, for the last two days I have been on the floor most of the time; and on yesterday, in order to get a little time to look into this matter, I had to object to the laying aside of the unfinished business. I can not give the details in figures. I have to speak mostly from memory. I am going to read a little from the report, but I am not able, therefore, to give details. I can say this, and any man can easily compute it in his mind, on the coal proposition: In addition to the things that the Senator from Wisconsin included in his question, it will save in the District of Columbia every year 240,000 tons of coal.

In a word it means this:

First. It will cut the price of electricity in half.

Second. It will save 240,000 tons of coal per year.

Third. It will pay maintenance charges, costs of operation, depreciation charges, interest at 6 per cent on all expenditures, and set aside a sinking fund sufficient to repay all expenditure in 30 years. This is the conclusion of the experts of the Government who spent the $25,000 in the investigation.

Mr. President, most of the Senators and Members of the House have seen Great Falls. They realize that it is a young Niagara within sight of the dome of the Capitol of the United States; and for 20 years the experts have been asking us to develop this water power. Somewhere in the neighborhood of 15 or 20 years ago we appropriated $20,000 to make an examination. It was made. One of the greatest hydroelectric engineers in the world had charge of that part of the investigation. The engineers made a complete and minute report in every detail. There are a dozen or fifteen other reports of less magnitude and less detail that have been made from time to time during the years that are past on this proposition; and then just last year because Senators thought we ought to reinvestigate the matter we spent $25,000 more and the same favorable report came back; and still the conferees on the part of the Senate do not even insist after we have passed it through the Senate twice that this amendment shall go back to the House for the consideration of the House when as a matter of fact the bill had to go back anyway.

Mr. President, before the Pilgrim Fathers landed on American soil the waters of the Potomac River were tumbling down over Great Falls and over the rapids between there and what later became the District line, winding their way to the sea—power enough to turn every wheel in the District, power enough to run every elevator in the Government departments, power enough to light every Government building, power enough to light every humble home in the city of Washington, power enough to propel every street car—and yet nothing is done to utilize this wasted power. Its power and its possibilities have been known for 75 years. Everybody who looks at it realizes the economic loss involved—the power that is going to waste and that ought to be put to use for the benefit of man.

What is this, Mr. President, that everybody wants and nobody can get? Where is the unseen and the hidden power that stays the hand of Congress and prevents the development of this wonderful water power for the benefit of the Capital City? Somewhere it has always been sufficiently potent and powerful to prevent action.

The Senate acts. Several Members of the House have told me that they were anxious to take up the matter and to act on it there; but the hand of Congress is stayed from time to time, and for 15 years the proposition was put off, put off with one excuse and another, until finally the Senate passed it; and then they used the very delay that this secret power and influence had brought about as an argument for further investigation. They said, "Let us investigate it again"; and when it is investigated again, and when approval comes again from the experts, then it is turned down arbitrarily, by main strength, by conferees who are supposed to represent the Senate in this conference.

It can not be claimed that it would have involved delay. Not one day of delay would have been made necessary by the sending of that item back to the House; but it went out. The approval of this conference report sounds the death knell to the development of Great Falls.

Mr. President, how long can we go on disregarding the plain mandates of duty without getting into trouble? How long are we going to delay developing a water power the waste of which is a disgrace to the Capital City? Some say there is no demand in Washington for it. There is something in that argument, Mr. President. If it lay by the side of the Senator's great city up in Minnesota, where they have developed one of the greatest powers in the world, the patriotic citizens of that city would not sleep until they took steps to develop it, as they did up there in that progressive State. There are too many men of wealth in Washington who are interested in the street railway companies, who are interested in the gas company, who are interested in the electric light company. There are too many and too powerful men all over the country interested in similar institutions who do not want the example set before the country of the development of Great Falls in the Capital City, where it will stand as an illustration to the whole country, and so it must be killed. Some way, somehow, there is always a way to kill it.

Mr. President, eight years ago, after I had made an unsuccessful attempt to secure the passage of a bill that would develop Great Falls, there was a change in the position of Secretary of War, and a man was placed in that office who had had a great reputation in Cleveland for the upbuilding of things similar to this for the benefit of municipalities, and I anticipated that he would be favorable to it. A man came into my office about that time and said: "Do you know that Col. Langfitt is going to be taken away from Washington?" Let me say that Col. Langfitt was an Army engineer who had charge of the investigation of Great Falls that was made about 15 or 20 years ago. He was an expert on that particular development. He knew it in detail. He has control of all the investigation that was made, and had charge of the expenditure of $20,000 of public money in making it. He was then in the city of Washington.

I said to the man, "Why, no; I have not heard of his going away." He said, "I have not, either, but he is going." He said, "I know nothing about it; but you have made another move to develop Great Falls. The man in the Army who knows more about it than anybody else is Col. Langfitt. Naturally, any bill introduced and referred to the War Department would be in turn referred to him, because he had spent years in making that investigation; but," he said, "he will not be here."

I said, "What do you know about it?" He said, "I do not know a thing, except that there are powerful interests all over the country that do not want Great Falls developed, and they will find some way of getting Col. Langfitt away, and when that bill goes to the War Department it can not go to him. It will go to some new man who knows nothing about it, who never has investigated it, and who necessarily will have to take a great deal of time to make a further investigation."

He said, "I am not charging anybody with doing anything wrong. I am not saying that the President or the Secretary of War are in on it, but there will be influences brought to bear to remove Col. Langfitt to some other field of operations. They will not say that they want to remove him in order to get him away from Great Falls, but there will be some other reason. It may be in reality a promotion, but you will find when your bill gets to the War Department that Langfitt will not be there and will not have an opportunity to say a word about it."

I knew nothing about it; but I did learn later, before anything further was done, when the bill got into the War Department for some consideration, that Col. Langfitt was away down in Florida, Alabama, or Georgia, somewhere, engaged in river and harbor work, trying to make some dry creek navigable, and of course was not here to have anything to say about Great Falls.

Secretary Baker, who, as I said a while ago, I had a right to think would be favorable to something of this kind, was against it for some reason. He sent a couple of officers out in a limousine to drive up and down the shores of the Potomac River, and they came back and made a report which made two objections to the development of the Great Falls water power. Let us see what they were. One was that the reason why the Government of the United States had a right to develop it was to get power and light for the use of the Government, and they said, "When this is developed, it will produce a great deal more power than the Government can use, and therefore we will have to pay a high price, because we will have to figure the cost on the amount of electricity which the Government uses"—a silly proposition, of course. Nobody expected the Government was going to use it all. Everybody who was interested in it thought that the people who live in the city of Washington would get some benefit in the matter of electric light, that they would get reductions, and that the street car companies would use it.

But these great gentlemen had another objection, that if we developed Great Falls, it would come in competition with electric light companies already in existence, which, of course, I have to admit was true. The Secretary of War approved their recommendations for the reasons, in substance, I have given.

Later on, when it was reexamined and reinvestigated, Secretary Baker approved it, and his official approval is before the Senate now in an official document.

Mr. NELSON. I believe we have in this city a commission composed of men who make it their business to agitate for the beautifying and improving of Washington. Has that commission ever turned a hand about improving this water power?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not heard of it. And the Senator's question reminds me that when the Langfitt report was up there was a great outcry that we were going to destroy the beauty of Great Falls, but when we came to examine that report we found that the development did not touch Great Falls; that it utilized only the power of the river between the base of Great Falls and the District line. My own idea is that it should utilize it all. But that argument was made.

Mr. President, if we are going to wait to develop Great Falls until such time as its development will not mean the making of electricity which will come in competition with existing plants manufacturing electricity, of course everybody knows we will never develop it. If that argument is good, then there is not a waterfall under the shining sun that can be developed.

Mr. President, the query is percolating through my brain as to how long this can go on. How long can Congress close its eyes to these conditions, and how long do you expect people to submit if Congress continues to close its eyes?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he does not think that the best way to get at this matter is by the introduction of a bill taking care of it, its reference to a proper committee, and consideration by that committee of all the merits and objections, and what not, instead of attempting to put it on an appropriation bill? Of course, it is legislation on an appropriation bill. That was the serious objection to its inclusion in this bill. I feel very much inclined to agree with the Senator about the importance of this water-power development. I am in hearty sympathy with his views on the subject. I feel that we ought to develop that power, and I hope it can be done.

But we are in this situation with reference to the pending bill: Here is an Army appropriation bill. There is put upon that appropriation bill this item of legislation in the Senate by amendment.

We meet the conferees on the part of the House, who promptly disagree to all our amendments, and they insist upon their disagreement. They have the vital objection to this amendment that it is legislation on an appropriation bill, that they are not authorized to agree to it, that they could not agree to it if they wanted to. They could have agreed to submit it to the House and have a separate vote on it in the House, but we have no way of compelling the House to take a separate vote on it. If the House conferees insist upon disagreeing to it, either we have to recede or there can be no coming together at all, and we get nowhere in our conference.

But the chief objection, as the Senator can see, is that it is legislation on an appropriation bill, and legislation which may lead eventually to the expenditure of $44,000,000 by the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Just about the cost of one battleship.

Mr. FLETCHER. Exactly; but it is quite a little item. The question is whether we ought not to take care of this whole matter by a separate measure, proceeded with in the usual way. It was the chief objection, I think, on the part of the House conferees, that we are attempting to put on an appropriation bill a piece of legislation with respect to another subject not related at all to the Army and the needs of the Army.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will take up the Senator's objections, and if I can not demonstrate that there is not anything in them I will be sorely disappointed.

First, I accept the Senator's statement in full that he favors this proposition. There is not any doubt about it. Yet his position illustrates the methods by which somebody, some way, somehow, always beats a proposition of this kind.

Put it in a separate bill, he says. Very good. It has been in a separate bill. It is slumbering yet, after years of suffocation, in pigeon holes in committees of the Senate.

Bring it in as a separate proposition, he says. Very good. But you can not get it across the threshold. Something happens. It should not be on the Army appropriation bill, the Senator says. Yet it is always conceded that the investigation of it must always be made by the War Department, as it always has been. Every official investigation that has been made, so far as I know, has been by the War Department.

What bill would we put it on? I have tried it on five or six, and it always meets the proposition, "It does not belong here; put it on some other measure."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator state what committee a separate bill is now pending before?

Mr. NORRIS. None at present that I know of; but I have in past Congresses introduced bills that have suffered and died a lingering death in various pigeon holes.

Where would we put it? Upon what bill could we put it? Not on the naval appropriation bill, because they would say at once, "This investigation has been made by the War Department; we do not know anything about it. We do not want it. We do not build dams and bridges; the War Department does. We do not look after harbors; the War Department does."

All right. Put it on the sundry civil appropriation bill, and the same objection is made; and it is the same way all around. Put it on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and they say "This is not a District proposition. Fundamentally the peg on which its constitutionality is hung is that the Government of the United States uses electricity, light, and power, and therefore it has a right to develop this water power. So it must not be on the District bill," although I had it referred several years ago to the District Commissioners, and they made a favorable report on it, and that was as far as it got.

The Senator from Florida says it is legislation on an appropriation bill. Let us take that up. I am glad he reminded me of it. This is an appropriation bill, and the amendment is legislation. The committee brought into the Senate an amendment to that bill in the identical words used in this amendment up to the point of the statement of the object of the expenditure, for the increased water supply of the District of Columbia. The Army appropriation bill, with some legislation on it put in by the Committee on Military Affairs, provided for the increased water supply of the District of Columbia. The Senator's own theory drives him clear out of court into the back yard.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment; I am not quite through with the Senator's objections.

That is not all. By the way, here is another little incident which, to my mind, is peculiar; it may have been just an accident. When the amendment providing for an increased water supply for the District of Columbia was before the Senate, I offered the amendment now in dispute as an amendment to that one; in other words, the foundation of the amendment for increasing the water supply came out of the very report this amendment comes out of. The very man, the very commission, the very engineer, investigated and made a favorable report upon both of them. The committee adopted it as to one and rejected it as to the other; and now they say, "You must not put it on this bill, because it is legislation on an appropriation bill." I was only following their own lead.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator knows that the water-power proposition was never laid before the Committee on Military Affairs. So how can the Senator say the committee rejected it?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator, too——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say a word to the Senator from New York in regard to that. Technically, the Senator may be right, although the amendment was offered and was referred to the committee. I did not appear there and call it up, it is true, and the reason why I did not, Mr. President, was because, as foolish as I am and as unimportant as I am, my time is too important to waste in appearing before committees when I know in advance what is going to happen to me.

Now I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is not altogether correct in his statement with regard to these two amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not through with them yet.

Mr. FLETCHER. His statement ought to be followed with this statement. Of course, if the Senator were making his argument to the House, I think it would be very much more effective, perhaps, than here, because that is the body which has to be convinced on this subject. The House conferees were willing to agree to amendment No. 52, providing for the increased water supply, subject to a vote of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; that is all I asked the Senate conferees to do with amendment No. 53.

Mr. FLETCHER. But they were not willing to agree even to take this amendment to the House. They were willing to take the other amendment to the House, and they did take it there, and it was discussed and voted on there.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but that is just a part of the amendment, and it was agreed to in the House.

Now I come to the other part of this question. The Senator from New York refers to this as a separate amendment from the other. It is not. It is marked so in the print, it is true, but I challenge anyone to show why it is thus marked. As a matter of fact, the records of the Senate will show that when the amendment brought in by the committee providing for an increased water supply was before the Senate I offered the Great Falls amendment as an amendment to the committee amendment, and it was agreed to. The Senator now sitting right at my left [Mr. JONES of Washington] was in the chair at that time, and if I make a statement that is not true in regard to it I want him to rise in his place and correct me.

That amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to. Then the Senator from Washington, as presiding officer of the Senate, put to the Senate the question on agreeing to the amendment as amended, and it was agreed to. There were not two amendments; there was only one amendment. That amendment provided for the increase of the water supply and the development of Great Falls. I challenge any Senator to contradict that statement. That is what the records of the Senate will show. But when the bill was printed and sent to conference it was in the form of two amendments, and that is what the conferees took. It was not right. It was not fair. It was not true. It was not a correct statement of the action of the Senate. There was only one amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely desire to say that I assume the RECORD shows what the Senator states. My recollection is very clear that the facts are as the Senator has stated, that he did offer his amendment as an amendment to the committee amendment, and it was so acted on by the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator. I have never looked at the RECORD. I assume the RECORD will show what the facts were. I can prove it, if I may have an opportunity, before any tribunal of justice. Let me subpœna the witnesses and I will prove it under oath, and I will prove it so conclusively that no one will dare contradict it.

Now, we are confronted with the fact that the House conferees were willing to go back to the House with one amendment but not with the other. The amendments were both legislation and they are both on an appropriation bill. As a matter of honesty, they were one amendment, and when they went back with one of them they could not in all honor and honesty go back without both. Had they gone back with both, in my judgment the one I am discussing would be in the bill now. I may be wrong, but at least in all fairness that ought to have been presented to the House.

Now, Mr. President, men get weary and tired of continually expending their lives and their time upon things that everybody seems to want and that nobody can get, and after a while they quit. Life is too short to spend it all on one thing like this. Compared with the whole great country it is a small item, I admit, but at least it is connected with the development of every great institution of similar nature in the United States.

I noticed while the bill was in conference that Secretary of War Weeks either sent a statement to the conferees or gave it out to the newspapers in regard to this amendment. I read it in the papers. I think he gave three reasons why it ought not to be on the bill. I do not know that I can state them now, but one was that it ought not to be on the Army appropriation bill. That is technical, of course, and I do not care to debate it further than I have already done. He could have made the same assertion in regard to the other one that everybody approved, and I approved, too, about the increased water supply for the District of Columbia. Perhaps that ought to have been in a separate bill. Why did not the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] introduce a bill for that purpose and make a separate measure of it and let a committee consider it and report upon it like he said we ought to do with this one? Why should they pick out something that is going to benefit the people when they want to be technical? When they want something they can avoid all the technicalities on earth to get it at once and by the shortest cut.

Secretary of War Weeks thought it ought not to be on the Army appropriation bill. That was one reason. I think another reason was that it was legislation on an appropriation bill, and the third reason was that he was not in favor of it. I concede to him his right to be opposed to it. There is no man here who has greater respect for Secretary of War Weeks than I. Opposed to it as he is, I would be perfectly willing if it were put into law to have him placed in absolute and supreme charge of its development. I think he would do the square thing, and do it right.

But must the Congress halt, must the conferees lie down, whenever Secretary Weeks says, "I do not like that legislation"? It would have been appropriate for some Senator or Member of the House to have said that, because he has something to do with the legislation, but Secretary Weeks evidently has forgotten that the last time he ran for the Senate he was defeated and that he is not now a Member of this body. He is just an ordinary Secretary of War. He is not legislating, and it is not for him to say whether Congress shall authorize the development of Great Falls. Suppose he is opposed to it? I would assume, without having talked with him, that he would be opposed to it. Lots of other good men like him, who get only a certain viewpoint, would not want to develop the water power of Great Falls because it might interfere with vested wealth, like the Potomac Electric Power Co. or the street car company or the gas company.

But that ought not to control the action of Congress. We can say to Secretary Weeks, "We have perfect respect for you, and you have a right to be opposed to this, but you are not a Member of the Senate, and while we should like to have your advice when we ask for it, valuable as it often is, we are not tying ourselves up as slaves to follow you or any other executive officer. We ought to have some brains and we ought to know something. If we do not, we ought not to be here. We ought to know something about legislation and we ought to follow our own convictions."

I know that many men, great men, honest men, able men, dislike to do anything of this kind for fear they will interfere with some one else in some investment he may have made in the business line. I remember I was in the House of Representatives when the first attempt was made to put a typesetting machine in the Government Printing Office, and there was an awful cry against it from honest men, misled, I think. They said, "You are going to throw a lot of these poor printers out of a job. They do not know anything but how to set type, and now you are going to put in a machine to do that work." There was a great propaganda brought about to compel Congress to legislate against putting typesetting machines in the Government Printing Office.

That is one of the steps in the progress of civilization, an improvement over present conditions. Sometimes it hurts an individual here or there, but very seldom it even does that. But if it does, for the good of the whole, for the good of humanity, we must not stop the progress of civilization in order to give some one a job or to protect some man's investment. Those printers who were thrown out of jobs got better jobs. It did not hurt anyone to have the typesetting machines put in the Government Printing Office. The laws of God and the laws of progress are such that in the end all are benefited if they are honest and fair. So when a man stands up and says that we must not develop Great Falls because it will interfere with the Potomac Electric Power Co., I say it will not. When it is said that we must not put typesetting machines in the Government Printing Office because it will throw some printer out of a job, I say it will give him a better job. I could not tell you just how, I could not tell you just where, I could not tell you just when, but those things right themselves. We must not stop progress and close our eyes to advancing civilization.

I remember when I was just a boy at home, working out among the neighboring farmers, there was one time when I and all the fellows like me made more money than at any other season of the year, and that was during harvest, when every farmer who had a quantity of wheat to cut had to hire a whole lot of men. We used to get the magnificent sum of $2 a day and board. We wanted the harvest to last just as long as possible in order that we might draw that mammoth salary. About that time along came some Yankee who had invented a self-binder, and in the community where I lived, honest, prosperous, patriotic citizens of northern Ohio, every one of them trying to do the best he could for himself and his family and his country, in that community where all the farmers raised wheat, one farmer a little more wealthy than the others bought a self-binder. I remember that it bound the wheat with wire instead of twine, as they do now. Everybody was talking about it. We knew about it before it came into the community. It came in the midst of harvest and was set to work, and it worked a day. Most of us thought it would not work at all. We did not think any man on earth could tie a knot by machinery around a sheaf of wheat, but this machine did it. It worked all day. That night, when the farmer who owned it was fast asleep, some one came into the wheat field, piled a lot of sheaves of wheat around it, and set it afire and burned it up.

Now, there was quite a feeling in that community among the poor who had to work out and who were always able to get a good wage during the harvest time. They thought that with the introduction of the self-binder their occupation was gone. They thought they were all going to become paupers. They were thinking of their friends, their mothers, their relatives, who were poor. Perhaps if they were older they thought of their children and their wives. They thought, "We have lost the most profitable season of the year by this mad, crazy invention that ties up a sheaf of wheat by machinery."

I remember well when I got home on the next Saturday night my poor old mother met me at the door, and the first thing she said was, "Willie, did you hear about the burning of John Marsh's self-binder?" I said, "Yes, I heard about it." She said, "Isn't it awful?" I said, "Yes, I think it is, mother." "Well, Willie," she said, "I am sorry about it; but, after all, what are the poor people going to do if all these new inventions get started?" She was, honest and true, the best woman that ever lived. She knew it was wrong; she was sorry they had burned it; she could not reach a conclusion that would approve that action; and yet down in her honest heart there came the doubt, "What are we going to do? We are going to become paupers. How are we going to live if these new inventions come into general use?"

Mr. President, the self-binder did not hurt the poor. The hired man does not now know how to make a band or to bind a sheaf of wheat. It was all for the good of the poor as well as for the good of everybody else. It was one of the steps in human progress. It was a sin and it was wrong to try to block it. Senators here who are opposed to the Great Falls development condemn such action; they have no sympathy with the poor printer who might be put out of a job by the installation of a machine, and yet in a bigger way, in a broader way, they are blocking human progress and making the people suffer because of their refusal to permit the development of the natural resources that God has given us. They are doing the very thing that the men did who burned up the self-binder; they are doing the very same kind of an act as that of the men who tried to prevail on Congress to prevent the putting into the Government Printing Office of typesetting machines; they are blocking human progress. We can not burn self-binders; we can not prevent the use of machines where they can do better work than human labor; and we can not prevent the development of water power without thereby affecting injuriously all humanity.

The sins of those who oppose such development will come home to trouble them. They are standing in the way of the onward march of civilization. Sooner or later they must go down beneath the waves of human progress, which they are only succeeding in backing up and making more powerful when the dam does break.

This is only a little matter, but the methods that have been adopted, the things that have happened for 15 years to block this legislation, are not creditable to the men who are responsible for them. The electric light company in Washington will get along, and the street car companies, if they only knew it, ought to want this development completed. God knows it would help those who have to pay the fares. Thousands and thousands who live in humble homes in this city and who would get the benefit of a reduced price for electric light and electric power and electric heat are thinking about it. We can not prevent progress without in the hearts of men who know the fact sowing the seeds of anarchy and revolution. It can not be done.

The destruction of the great Empire of Russia came about not because of some little thing that suddenly happened, not because of something that occurred yesterday or last week, but it resulted from an accumulation of causes that went back through the centuries. The men and the women who had grown gray working for somebody else without a chance to get anything but their board and clothes had begun to think. They had been thinking for years; they knew that they were downtrodden; they knew that above them was an aristocracy that was not just, that was living off their toil and their sweat and their brains. They were subdued for hundreds of years, but gradually, little by little, their resentment became stronger, and the opportunity came during the World War for them to throw off the yoke. They went further than many of us desired to see them go; and yet if I or you, Mr. President, had lived all our lives toiling 16 hours a day for somebody else, and we knew that our fathers and our mothers and our grandfathers and our grandmothers before us had done the same thing, and that as the result of our toil we had built up a class of aristocrats who were living off the sweat of our faces and of our forefathers' faces, we, too, would have been bolsheviks; we, too, would have revolted.

That instance affords a lesson in psychology, and the pending controversy presents another. What has happened in another place will happen here. It is an interesting study in psychology, Mr. President, to endeavor to ascertain how long it will take to make an honest, patriotic, educated, intelligent man into an anarchist; but it can be done. There is not a Senator here who, if the influences in that direction surrounded him long enough, would not become an anarchist.

Several years ago, Mr. President, I boarded a street car to ride to my residence. I was hanging on to a strap, as was usually the case with me. The car was not being operated very carefully and the passengers were jostled around a good deal. I was jostled up against another man who was hanging to a strap. We accepted our bumping against each other as a kind of introduction and began conversing. I found that he was a very bright and fine looking man, about 35 years of age or, perhaps, 40. He was an educated man, and he expressed to me some very bitter sentiments against the street car company. He said, "I have been hanging to these straps for now nearly 20 years and I am getting tired of it. I pay for a seat, but I never get one." The upshot of it was that I became interested in the man and, out of pure curiosity, in pursuance of a sort of psychological study, when he got off the car I got off with him. I conversed with him there for more than an hour. He told me that when he was a growing boy he had come to Washington with his father, who at that time was a Member of the House of Representatives. If I should mention the father's name Senators who are here would remember him, because he had a national reputation. My acquaintance said, "I married the daughter of a Member of Congress in Washington; our fathers are both dead and neither one of them left us any money to speak of. I have had a job ever since my father was in Congress. I have been put under the civil service and my job is secure." He told me the salary he was receiving. He had five children, and he lived in one of a row of houses which he had bought but which was quite heavily mortgaged. He had recently had considerable sickness in his family. He said, "I have sentiments now that I almost blush to hold even in the dark. They are as different from what my father taught me and what I believed when I grew up as anything possibly could be." He said, "Formerly I hated such things as union labor; years ago I had no sympathy with the man who had been thrown out of his job; I had no sympathy for any cry for better wages or working conditions; but," he continued, "I have been hanging on to that strap for 20 years, and, I am sorry to say it but the truth is that if a street car passed here now and ran off the track and caught fire I would not cross the street to put it out." Think of the spirit of anarchy that had grown up in this man's heart! He had suffered from what I call "strapitis," a disease that afflicts most of the people in the city of Washington who do not ride in automobiles. It had had no effect at first, but "strapitis will get you, if you don't watch out." It wore on his nerves; day after day when tired and he felt that he ought to be sitting down he was holding on to a strap until he lost his respect for property—a very lamentable condition; in my judgment one to be very much regretted.

I kept track of that man for a while. He was still in the civil service when the war broke out, but shortly thereafter was discharged from the Government employ. In my conversation I told him who I was and he kept track of me, to some extent. When he got into difficulty he came to my office about his position. He had lost his home, the mortgage being foreclosed; his wife had died; and he wanted me to try to keep him in his position; but when he told me his sentiments and what he had said at various times I refused to aid him. I said, "You are not true to your country; if I were in authority over you, I would discharge you to-day; you have no business to be in the Government service; every drop of my blood goes out in sympathy to you, because you are the victim of a system that is wrong. Your own statements show you are disloyal. We must not give up to such things; we must not surrender to influences of that kind and lose our patriotism, even though we lose every battle and in the end lose our lives. We must have more faith."

This man was a disloyal anarchist, made so by years of injustice. Unfair treatment of the common people will always in the end bring ruin to the powerful influences which perpetrate it. Those of you who prevent the development of such things as Great Falls are sowing to the whirlwind, and sooner or later either you or your descendants will reap the fruits of your unjust conduct.

Mr. President, the point is that every man, woman, and child in their minds will be influenced by years of abuse and coercion until reason will fly from the brain and they will become murderers and anarchists.

Mr. President, I know that what I am preaching now and what I have taught previously, even before I came to this body, meets severe condemnation by many great and good people. While it is never very agreeable to speak particularly of one's self, I think I ought to give another instance that happened to me here in the Senate. When I came to the Senate from the House of Representatives I was not aware that I was looked upon with suspicion by Members of this body because of the attitude which I had taken in connection with matters that had happened in the House of Representatives in a weak effort to right what I believed to be wrong there; what I believed to be machine control there. I was not aware that that had given me an unsavory reputation here in this Chamber. There was a Senator here whom I will use to illustrate the thought I have in mind, one of the best men who ever lived. He is yet a Member of this body. I would not be afraid to trust my life in his hands; and yet he has the other viewpoint; he has the same viewpoint as that of Secretary Weeks: "Do not do this thing. Let George do it, because George can make some money out of it. Do not let the Government do it."

He has that viewpoint. It is perfectly proper if he wants it. I am not complaining; and after I had been here for two or three months, that good Senator confessed to another one, who himself told me the story, and he said, "I have watched that man"—referring to me—"ever since he came here, and, do you know, I have finally come to the conclusion that he is honest."

I did not know that he had an idea that I was dishonest. I was innocent of the fact that I suppose every time I came into his vicinity he clapped his hand on his pocketbook. I did not know that he was afraid to trust me or take my word, and yet I did not believe then that he ever thought I had committed robbery. I do not suppose that man really thought that I was a murderer. I do not suppose he really believed that I would steal another fellow's automobile if I got a chance down here on the street, or that I would lie to another Senator on the floor of the Senate; and yet he had the viewpoint that there was something wrong—the viewpoint of the man who sees nothing except through the eyes of big business; the viewpoint of the man who himself, good and holy though he is, is a member of the political machine. He always followed his leader, and I did not always. He always obeyed the command of the political machine. He believed that was the best way to govern the people; and if the machine took one position to-day, he stood for it. If it took the opposite position to-morrow, he stood for that without a blush, in the first place, because it relieved him from thinking; and, in the next place, because he did not feel responsible for it anyway. That was his point of view. He was just a cog in a great, big political machine, and he has rolled around in the grease and the oil of that machine day after day and year after year, and he is perfectly satisfied. He can not see out for the grease.

He has a perfect right to have those views; but that is the viewpoint that the big man is a great patriot who will give a job to a poor fellow, even though he makes a thousand per cent and the poor fellow has hardly enough to live on. It is the doctrine that the fellow who has a job that pays enough to provide his board and his clothes ought to be satisfied; and when he raises up his hand like Oliver Twist, and comes back for another bowl of soup the man who has this viewpoint is shocked. He does not think the fellow understands what is good for him, and so he goes on the theory that the big fellow ought to dish it out as he sees best.

Mr. President, we are doing those things. We are saying here, "You must not put this item on this bill, because it is legislation on an appropriation bill," when, as a matter of fact, the very amendment to which it honestly ought to be attached is likewise an amendment in the nature of a legislative proposition on an appropriation bill. "That is all right, because we want it; but this is all wrong, because we do not want it, although the reason is just the same. Be technical and put it off when big business does not want it; dispense with technicality and put it on when big business is satisfied."

Mr. President, I have not any idea that I can defeat this conference report. I realize that it is nearly the 1st of July. I realize that the charge can be and probably will be made that by my delay I am increasing the expense of the Government. That charge is usually made against anybody who undertakes to do anything of this kind; but I want to warn the Senate that we can not keep on always, that a suffering people will not always suffer silently, and that while this in itself is a little thing, it is one of many thousands of things; and when the Senate of the United States has expressed its will after a full debate, once upon a roll call, we ought not to cast it aside just because somebody says, "Oh, this is not the way to do it. Do it some other way." I promise you, Mr. President, that it is coming home to roost again. You will have a chance to do it in some other way; and then listen to the fellows, as you have heard them to-day, say, "Do it still some other way."

Just before this report came in the cry was, "Oh, investigate some more. We have only spent $20,000 of the people's money investigating it. That was quite a while ago. Let us spend some more"; and so we will keep on with technicalities and delay and delay and delay, until five or six years from now you will be able to say, "Let us investigate it again. Maybe Great Falls has disappeared in the meantime. Maybe God has moved the falls. Maybe they are running uphill now, instead of down. Let us have an expert out there, at a cost of $25,000, to see"; and so on around and around and around and around, until the people get disgusted and get tired of going from the Democratic Party to the Republican Party, and from the Republican Party to the Democratic Party, jumping out of the frying pan into the fire and from the fire into the frying pan, and finding always the same kind of a dish served up to them, and say, "To hell with both of your parties"; and they will do it if you keep on. Then the time will come when you fellows who think more of big business than you do of your religion will be on your bended knees to such men as shall follow me—because I shall not be here then—praying for protection against the mob. The men who are called radicals and progressives now will be the conservatives to whom the weeping, suffering world will plead for justice; and it may be that the pendulum will have swung so far that justice will be impossible.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments on this matter.

I think the Senator from Nebraska can disabuse his mind of any suspicion that vested interests, mysterious, secret, sinuous, have had anything to do with the action of the Senate conferees upon this matter. I am not going to discuss the inference that he drew, a very clear inference, before the Senate. It is not worthy of discussion; and I think, too, that he can disabuse his mind of the idea that the Secretary of War exercised any influence upon the Senate conferees by the letter to which the Senator from Nebraska has alluded. The truth is that that letter reached the chairman of the Senate conferees after the conferees had passed upon this question, and the letter was never alluded to in the conference meetings.

Mr. President, I think I can relate exactly what happened. I know, of course, that the Senator is disappointed and many other Senators are disappointed at the failure of the Senate conferees to maintain this item in the bill. The Senator is not alone in his disappointment. The Senator from New York has suffered from some disappointments in this matter just as severe and perhaps even more severe than that suffered by the Senator from Nebraska. There are some things, however, that human beings can not accomplish under the legislative procedure of the House and the Senate relating to conferences.

This matter was placed upon the Army appropriation bill by a vote of the Senate. When it was reached in conference it was discussed in connection with the amendment next preceding it, having to do with the water-supply proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator may.

Mr. NORRIS. On that very question, does the Senator know how it happened that this went as two amendments instead of one, which the Senator must admit it ought to be?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not the slightest idea.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator admits, does he not, that it was all one amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have read the RECORD since the Senator made that observation in his speech, and I notice that the Presiding Officer presented the question as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I offered the amendment as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I recollect it. I have not the slightest idea how they happened to be numbered separately, but whether numbered separately or together made no difference whatsoever in the conference. The attitude of the House conferees would have been exactly the same, and the amendment, had it been one amendment, would have been divisible, and they would have insisted upon it just as they insisted upon their action on amendment No. 53.

Mr. NORRIS. If it had been one amendment, as it ought to have been, as in reality it was, then it would have gone back to the House as one amendment, would it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If we could have compelled them to take it back.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, they took the other part back.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We succeeded in compelling them to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. This is exactly on all fours with the other as far as any technicality is concerned.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They did not think so. Now, the Senator is not persuading me. The Senator should persuade the House conferees. We did our best. We did not make one inch of progress with them.

We had a good deal of difficulty in persuading them to take amendment 52 back to the House. It required a long discussion and a lot of pleading to get them to do that, and they only did it because Congress had at the last session adopted that same amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Was it not true that a number of the House conferees said very frankly they did not know but that they would favor the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska, but inasmuch as it was a project which would probably cost as much as $44,000,000, they thought it should not be put as a rider on the Army appropriation bill? While I favor the project, it seemed to me that there was a good deal of reason in that contention made by the members of the conference committee on the part of the House, and that was one of their contentions on which they seemed to feel very strongly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from New York just said that this other part of the amendment—about the water supply—they took back for the reason that it had passed the Senate at the last session.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was one of the potential reasons.

Mr. NORRIS. That was true of my amendment, was it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it was not.

Mr. NORRIS. It passed the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On another bill, and passed the Senate alone; but the amendment embodying the water-supply project passed both Houses at the last session on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not contending that my amendment passed the House; but it did pass the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The other one did, and my statement still holds. There shall be no misunderstanding about it. We finally persuaded the House conferees after a great deal of difficulty to submit to the House the water supply amendment, and the factor in the discussion which I believe was influential in gaining their consent to that line of action was the fact that both Houses had passed it at the last session on the Army appropriation bill, in the same connection.

While the conference was going on the Senator from Nebraska asked me how we were progressing with respect to the water power amendment. At that time the House conferees had notified us that under no circumstances would they take it back to the House; and they are the masters of that situation. They do not have to do it unless they are willing. The Senator from Nebraska asked me if I would not plead with them at the next meeting to take it back for a separate vote, without committing themselves, as House conferees, for or against the proposition. We tried that, but they refused.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has mentioned one of the arguments which the House conferees presented. I think the Senate ought to realize the effect of the new House rules when it comes to judge of the activity or the faithfulness of the Senate conferees. It is not pleasant, may I say to the Senator, to have him infer that we lay down, that we were faithless to the mandate of the Senate. The Senator has to come to understand, if he has not already done so, what these House rules on conferences are to-day. They were changed last year, and the result is that you no longer have a free and open conference. The Senate is helpless, and will continue helpless until it changes its rules in certain respects, so that in a measure we can retaliate and defend our rights.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the Senator think that the time has now come for us to refuse to go into a conference until we know it is to be a full and free conference?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a question of very grave policy on the part of the Senate. When the House rules were changed so as to put the appropriating power solely in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations of the House, the chairmen and members of the standing committees, which up to that time had had the function of appropriating for the several departments, insisted that they would surrender that appropriating power to the single committee, the Appropriations Committee, upon one condition, a condition which must never be violated, namely, that the Appropriations Committee should never, upon its own initiative, attempt to legislate; that it should confine itself only to appropriating.

The House conferees, when they encounter in bills amendments inserted by the Senate of a legislative or semilegislative character, instantly resist, and say, "We have no right to take back to the House anything in the nature of legislation unless we can show that the House itself is familiar with the thing, and has passed it in one way or another." The House rules do not contain such a provision, but that is the attitude taken by the House conferees. The House conferees assert that if they should yield to legislative amendments of vast importance inserted by the Senate committing the Government to a line of policy extending some distance into the future, the House itself would turn and rend them. They refuse positively and absolutely to take back any such amendment.

Every time the Senate, or the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, has inserted amendments in the Army appropriation bills since the new rules of the House were adopted we have had to carry the burden of proof that the submission of such an amendment to a separate vote in the House would not present to the House something new and unheard-of and undiscussed prior to that time. We failed to persuade them, in two or three other instances, to submit to the House legislative amendments inserted by the Senate.

When it came to this one they took this attitude, "The House has never discussed this thing; no committee of the House has ever reported upon this thing; the House does not know anything about this thing. The House will turn and tear us to pieces if we try to put this thing over. We refuse absolutely to take it back to the House." What can the Senate conferees do? That is the attitude of the House conferees, and apparently the conferees of the House have the backing of the House in pursuing that general policy.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] suggested that perhaps the time had come when the Senate should refuse to go into a conference under existing conditions. If the Senate would observe its own rule with reference to appropriation bills, conferences would be full and free between the two Houses to-day, would they not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In a much larger extent.

Mr. LENROOT. Would they not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. Of course, the Senate has a rule forbidding legislation upon appropriation bills, and nearly all the legislation that is inserted in the Army appropriation bill by the Senate is inserted by unanimous consent, except in this case, when the rule of the Senate was voted down on a point of order, and the Senate put the amendment in regardless of the rule.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think the Senator is wrong about that; and the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, I think, carries a wrong impression. These provisions are put in according to the rules of the Senate, taken as a whole.

Mr. WADSWORTH. By unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes. The Senate has a rule that by unanimous consent it can do business, and when it votes such an amendment in a bill it does it in accordance with the rules of the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This was done under a rule of the Senate which authorized the Presiding Officer to submit the point of order to the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That was done, and the Senate, acting as it saw fit, took that action.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senate had a perfect right to do it. But the House is watching the Senate every time it does it, and when the conferees on the part of the Senate go into conference with the House conferees, who are apparently representing a body which is intent upon defending itself, as they see it, against the tactics of the Senate, they find themselves absolutely powerless to persuade the House conferees to take back to the House for a separate vote legislative amendments of far-reaching character.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON of Indiana in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to ask whether the Senator from New York and the Senator from Washington will not both agree that the Senate itself, by vote, very often violates its own rules?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly. It has a right to do so by a vote, and does it occasionally.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator from New York a very practical question. If the Senate conferees had held out for this amendment, is it not true that we would be in hopeless deadlock now, and probably in hopeless deadlock six months from now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We would be sitting in the room of the Committee on Military Affairs right now.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was impossible, because the Members of the House had said that they would not under any circumstances agree to a $44,000,000 proposition brought in in this way. That is all there is to it. We had to agree if we were going to get a bill. That is the practical side of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, that is the history of the transaction in the conference committee. I regret exceedingly that Senators are disappointed in this matter. As I said a moment ago, I personally have suffered exceedingly great disappointment in the conference on this bill. My disappointment will be stated a little later, if, in its judgment, the Senate adopts the report of the conference committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator from New York to think that I am joining in criticism of the Senate conferees. I feel satisfied that under the circumstances the Senate conferees did about the only thing they could do with reference to this matter. I should have been very glad indeed if they could have secured the agreement of the House conferees to this item. But I am satisfied it would have been useless for them to hold out longer; and, furthermore, the condition is a little different from what it will be some other time with reference to these appropriation bills. This bill must be enacted into law by the 30th of this month or we will have to continue the appropriations by resolution or some other way. I have no criticism to make of the Senate conferees. I feel that they did the very best they felt they possibly could do; and I think they did the very best they could do. I have had some little experience with House conferees, and I can sympathize with our conferees in the situation which confronted them.

I am not going to discuss this item. I should have been very glad, as I said, if it had been kept in the bill. I hope the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] will, if he has not already done so, introduce a separate bill and have it referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, if that is the proper committee to consider it, and I assure him that so far as I am concerned, I shall do everything I can to have action taken by that committee on such a bill. Of course, I am only one member of the committee, and I can not speak for others, but that is a course which can be taken without waiting for another appropriation bill to come up next winter. We may not get very far, but we can agitate the matter at any rate, and if we can get a favorable report from a committee of the Senate upon a bill providing for this water-power development, I think it will be a step in the right direction.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is a member of the District Committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am.

Mr. NORRIS. I assure the Senator now that I will follow out his suggestion. I shall hold him to his promise, and I know when the Senator gives his word he will keep it, and I know that if he keeps it he can have something done. I will introduce the bill, and will have it referred, if I can, to the District Committee, and I will depend on the Senator to see that something happens to it beside slow death.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I have said, I am only one member of the committee; but I will do the very best I can. Of course, I will expect the aid and assistance of the Senator from Nebraska in presenting the matter to the committee. There are some good Senators on that committee who probably do not agree with me with reference to this measure, and the principle embodied in it, and I shall expect them, of course, to oppose a favorable report. I may be the only one on the committee in accord very largely with the views of the Senator from Nebraska.

I have wondered time and again why it is that for the ages past this great water power has been going to waste. There has been a great deal of talk, especially here in the East, about conservation of water power, and yet right at the very door of the National Capital, where a great many of these fulminations have been generated and formed and made, we have a water power that has been going to waste since time began. It seems to me that it is time for us to make some use of it, to conserve it in a proper way, and, as I said, I shall do everything I can in the committee to have action taken.

I desire to ask the Senator from New York about another amendment in this report, amendment No. 56. I find from the report that the Senate conferees agreed on that amendment. That is the amendment which provides that—

> No part of the moneys appropriated in this act shall be used for paying to any civilian employee of the United States Government, > an hourly wage or salary larger than that customarily paid by private individuals for corresponding work in the same locality.
>
> * * * * * * *

Now, the Senator, of course, remembers the provision that the Senate put in which took care of the situation where the wages had been adjusted by wage boards. As I understand the effect of this language of the House, it will be something like this. Take some locality, or take almost any locality for that matter, where there is a Government institution, a navy yard, and where there are civilian employees engaged in work; if the prevailing rate of wages in the locality is a certain amount for a 10-hour day, then the wages paid to the civilian employees will be reduced proportionately below that wage because the Government employee works an 8-hour day. Is that correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not sure that I understand the Senator. Would it not be increased?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Wages of persons in certain employment in the locality are based upon 10 hours' work, because that is the prevailing day in such institutions.

Mr. LENROOT. It is so much an hour?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; as a general rule they get so much a day, but it is for 10 hours a day in many cases. Government employees work only 8 hours, so that they will get a similar wage except it will be reduced by the proportion of 2 hours, or in the proportion that 8 bears to 10.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is not my understanding of the situation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am constrained to believe that will be the effect of the language, and that it means a reduction of the wages of Government employees in a way that Congress does not contemplate. We have taken the position in a legislative way that 8 hours is a proper day's work. We have done that very largely on the theory that a man will do about as much in 8 hours as he will in 10. So we have based our wage on that theory, and the wage boards have regulated the wages on that basis. In other words, where they fix the wages at the same as those paid by similar establishments in the neighborhood, they give to the Government employees the same wage for an 8-hour day that a man in a civilian establishment gets for 10 hours. Now, if we take away the provision for wage-board establishments and say that no part of the money appropriated in this act shall be used for paying to any civilian employee of the United States Government an hourly wage or salary larger than that customarily paid by private individuals for corresponding work in the same locality, it seems to me we compel them to reduce the wage in the proportion that 8 bears to 10.

In my judgment, that is what this language requires. I do not think that is right, I do not think it is fair, I do not think it is just. I do not think that is what our past legislation contemplates. It seems to me that the language of the Senate amendment ought to have been maintained if it was possible to maintain it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, my view is in accord with that of the Senator from Washington, that the language not only reduces the wage of all civilian employees in the arsenals of the country but it reduces the wages of clerks, stenographers, and typists, because the language referred to fixes the wage on a per hour basis. It means that while they work they shall be paid the same wage per hour as that paid other employees in private enterprises.

That has not been the policy of the Government in the past. Young ladies working in clerical positions who work seven hours a day will be paid a less wage per day than stenographers and typists who work eight or nine hours in private employment. It is a very serious matter and one that means a decided cut in wages to every civilian employee of the War Department. It not only means a cut in wages but a deduction for half holidays and possibly vacations or sick-leave time.

I am very sorry that the conferees on the part of the Senate yielded and agreed to the House amendment. I think the amendment which the Senate proposed and which the Senator from New York originally favored would have protected them by reason of the provision that the wage board should still have authority, and that this per hour wage would not be binding in certain cases. I am sure that very serious condemnation of the action of Congress will follow the enactment into law of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator from New York? As I understand the conference report, the Army, after September of this year, will be reduced to 150,000 enlisted men. Is that the result of the conference report?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That will be the result of the action of the Senate if it complies with my request relative to the House action. The report which is now before the Senate leaves in disagreement the item "Pay of enlisted men." That is the item which controls the size of the Army for the next year.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator intend to discuss that after the adoption of the report?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do. The report carries in effect agreements upon everything else. The House in the meantime has voted separately on some amendments which it took with amendments.

Mr. KING. I shall ask the Senator about that a little later.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The status to-day is just this: There is only one thing in disagreement between the two Houses at this moment, and that is pay of enlisted men of the Army. That is the way I am stating it as a practical proposition. There are one or two little technical differences, but they do not amount to anything.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like an expression from the Senator for the RECORD in reference to the proposition I have just discussed. My idea is that the Senator from New York does not think that should be the construction given to the language.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have that appear in the RECORD.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When this language appeared in the bill as it was passed by the House we were somewhat confused as to just what its effect would be, and I think I said so on the floor in a little colloquy with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I myself proposed the Senate amendment, saying at the time that it seemed entirely reasonable to me as an original proposition, but that it would throw it into conference, and we could discuss the exact meaning of the language. The House conferees discussed quite freely and openly with us the two provisions. Their interpretation of their own language is that it will have no effect whatsoever except to prevent the Government making wages now paid or to be paid in the future—and when I say "wages" I mean the full wage—higher than are paid for similar work on the outside.

We had a long talk about it. It can be read in one or two different ways, and we can figure out just what its effect will be. There is very little difference between the two Houses on it. We only put in the words "other than those whose pay is adjusted from time to time through wage boards." Wage boards would still be subject to the existing custom. I do not think it is going to have the effect suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. If it does, if it is construed by the administrative officers to justify a cut and slash on the basis suggested by the Senator from Washington, Congress can cure it very quickly by a joint resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does not the Senator think the fixing of the wage on a per hour basis in this way amounts to an annulment of the powers of the wage board? If wage boards are paying civilian employees more than similar employees are paid per hour in private industries, and we pass legislation to prevent such payment, we practically nullify the operations and judgment of the wage board. That is the effect of the language. I really think the Senator from New York does not appreciate the importance of this change.

I have in my hand a memorandum prepared by the representatives in Washington of the organized employees of the arsenals and other divisions of the War Department which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, and which will tend to show just how they consider this law will operate. I ask permission to insert that in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum is as follows:

JUNE 15, 1921.

MEMORANDUM SHOWING REASONS WHY SENATE AMENDMENT NO. 56, ON CIVILIAN WAGES IN ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL, SHOULD BE ADOPTED AND HOUSE PROVISION REJECTED

1. The House provision states in effect that civilian employees paid from this bill shall receive as a maximum the hourly wage paid by private individuals in the same locality. A department head can therefore pay as much below that as he wants to.

2. There is no law compelling the War Department to even pay the prevailing rate. This requirement is covered only by department regulations. Hence, inasmuch as the House provision prohibits payment in the event the prevailing rate is exceeded, any error in this regard would have to be made up by the disbursing officer. This is a powerful deterrent as against a mere direction to pay the prevailing rate.

Disbursing officers would be disposed to pay less than the prevailing rate to be on the safe side.

3. For practically a generation, or ever since the 8-hour law was enacted for work performed by the Government, it has been the rule for the Government to pay for an 8-hour day whatever was paid by private concerns for their regular workday, whether that workday was 8, 9, or 10 hours. At present many private employers operate their shops on an 8-hour basis, others on a 9-hour basis.

Under the House provision the Government could pay its employees only eight-ninths of the day's pay obtaining in private shops in the vicinity where the 9-hour day was in vogue. Clerks in the Government service working seven hours would receive only seven-eighths of the pay received in private shops where eight hours are worked.

4. For a long term of years it has been customary for the Government to be a model employer and pay a wage equivalent to what the better class of employers were paying in private industry, not the very highest wages paid, but the average high wages paid.

The House provision has already been interpreted by officials of the War Department to mean that they must not exceed the average rate which compels them to take into consideration rates of pay obtaining in shops operated by the most illiberal and mercenary employers in the community.

5. The Civil Service Committees of the Senate and House are at present holding hearings with the object in view of having enacted a reclassification measure. Employees of the Government are expecting Congress to be acting in good faith and not to allow amendments of this kind to be slipped through which, in effect, will reduce wages to a point where the Government will become the most illiberal large employer of labor. What can Government employees expect if while waiting for reclassification laws are enacted to place as a maximum rate in the Government service the average obtaining in private industry, the basis being the hourly rate? This appears to be the most restricted and illiberal construction that could be adopted as a basis for wage adjustment.

6. Congress has been insisting that the employees should be satisfied with wage boards. As a result of this thought, the $240 bonus was abolished for these very employees whom the House provision would still further restrict as to wages.

If employees are to rely upon wage boards, Congress should not at the same time arbitrarily reduce wages and, in effect, take the setting of wages out of the hands of wage boards.

Employees in the arsenals would be directly affected by this House provision in the Army bill. Wage boards have recently been convened at the arsenals. In most cases their decisions have been reached, and awards put into effect in some instances. In other instances they probably will be effective not later than July 1 next.

At the Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, for instance, the wage board consisted of three Army officers and four foremen. Employees had been denied the right of representation or the privilege of presenting data or arguments several months before, and although this privilege has been restored by the Ordnance Office, the employees have never been so advised. The result was that a wage scale was set without even giving the employees a hearing. This resulted in a drastic cut in pay. For instance, the maximum pay set for machinists is $5.04 per diem. The average pay for machinists, tool makers, and instrument makers is $4.92 per day, in addition to which they will receive the $240 bonus until July 1. On July 1 their average pay will be $4.92 per day. This rate is $1.24 per diem below the average rate which will be received by machinists in the railroad service on July 1, as recently determined by the Railroad Labor Board. These facts are undisputed and show a most illiberal policy pursued by the Government. Instead of Congress attempting to further place the Government employees at a disadvantage, it ought to come to their rescue and insist upon a fair rate being set.

As a direct comparison, on July 1 machinists on the railroads will receive $6.16 per day. Machinists, tool makers, and instrument makers at the Frankford Arsenal will receive rates as follows:

Ten per cent will receive $5.44.
Forty per cent will receive $5.04.
Thirty-five per cent will receive $4.64.
Fifteen per cent will receive $4.24.

7. The House provision was an amendment by Congressman LUCE, of Massachusetts. The illustration he used (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 10, p. 1279) in justification of this amendment would allow Government clerks working seven hours only $14.826 in the Government service, whereas in the private shop, from which her wages were set, she would receive $18 per week. Thus the Government would pay less and enable private employers to obtain all skilled Government workmen.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator from New York if he does not think that this is of sufficient importance to justify recommitting the report?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I do not. A recommittal of the report would cost the Government millions of dollars. If harm has been done, and I am not persuaded that it has, it can be cured very quickly and restitution made to those who have been unjustly treated.

I do not know whether I have seen the memorandum which the Senator has just placed in the RECORD, but I, too, had a memorandum furnished me, and I also conversed with some of the representatives to whom the Senator has referred. At that time they did not bring up the point which the Senator has brought up, but they brought up quite a different one. We had an entirely frank and friendly conversation about it. It was at their suggestion originally that I offered the amendment. They were uncertain themselves as to what the effect would be. All they complained against was the uncertainty of the House language. The House conferees felt absolutely certain what it would do, and we had a long talk about it. Both sides were entirely friendly to the arsenal employees. I think they are not injured. If they are, that injury can be cured very quickly, I can assure the Senator, and it can be cured in a way which will make the cure retroactive to the commencement of the injury.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not share the Senator's optimism about curing quickly legislative mistakes of this kind. My experience has been that it is very difficult to get legislation through Congress, especially legislation tending to increase wages after they have been once reduced.

I do not wish to take the position of advocating increases or decreases in wages. I am willing to have Congress either decrease or increase, but I want it done in the open; I want it done so that labor will have a chance to be heard. I do not want it done by a conference committee without any chance for labor to present their views and their objections. That is what is happening here now. Under the proposed legislation the wage boards have been absolutely eliminated from any general discussion in fixing rates of wages. The wage boards' powers under the law are so absolutely curtailed that even if they think an employee deserves to be paid more than he is getting they can not grant it, because here is a law, not a rule or regulation, which limits the wages of any civilian employee, male or female, in a clerical position or mechanical position, to the amount paid by private employers in that local community per hour, not per day.

It means that a man working for the Government in a Government plant eight hours per day and other employees in a private industry where the men work nine hours per day will not get an equal wage. Employees working in the Government plant will get eight-ninths of the wage paid to those working in private employment. Can anyone possibly dispute that? Does the Senator from New York dispute that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I doubt if that is a proper interpretation of the language.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What does the language mean, if it does not mean that? The language provides that the Government employee shall be paid the rate of wage per hour, not per day, that is paid in private industry; so that if a private employee is working nine hours and the Government employee is working eight hours, the wage paid the Government employee for eight hours will be eight-ninths of the wage paid the private employee for nine hours' work. There can not be any dispute about that. That is why I again ask the Senator to take the report back for further consideration, because of the possibility that he has not appreciated that the provision involves a cut in wages. I want it known that it means a reduction of wages to every civilian employee, and that such action is taken by this administration. The consequences must fall where they will. I do not believe the Senator appreciates that, or he would not consent to it without at least giving these people a chance to be heard.

This is not the time for the Government to cut wages by legal enactment. The wage boards were created for the purpose of hearing wage disputes and reducing and increasing wages, dependent upon what the cost and expenses of living might be from time to time and in different places. There is no necessity of discussing the matter that the purpose and intent is to reduce the wages of every civilian employee who is working under the War Department of the Government. This action will accomplish that result, and there will be a very serious and very great reaction, and the Government will be the loser, because it will breed dissatisfaction among all employees.

I hope the Senator from New York, in view of the discussion here and the suggestions which have been made, will take the matter up further with the House conferees. It will not take very long, if the report is sent back, to reconsider this matter.

The wage-adjustment boards might just as well go out of existence if the bill shall be permitted to remain as it is. The wage boards were created for the purpose of exercising discretion in the fixing of wages. Here is a proposed law which provides that there shall be no discretion in the wage boards, but that the rate per hour shall be what is paid in the locality by private employers. We might just as well abolish the wage boards. Why pay salaries and maintain the boards when they will not have any power? I hope the Senator from New York will consent to having the conference report go back so that the conferees on the part of the House may reconsider the matter and the Senate conferees may insist upon the insertion of the language which the Senate formerly inserted. The Senator must have had some doubt about the meaning of the House language when he and his committee, when the bill was before the Senate, inserted language which narrowed the scope of the House provision, or else he would not have taken such action. Now, the Senate conferees have yielded to the House conferees their own suggestion that the provision should not be so sweeping as adopted by the House, but that it should be modified so as to leave the matter to the wage boards to determine and settle.

May I again ask the Senator from New York if he does not think that the matter is of sufficient importance to again take it up with the House conferees?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I really do not. I think if it turns out that a mistake has been made, of which I am not at all sure, it can be cured later on.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. I think there is much merit in what he says, but would it be open to the conferees to correct the situation of which the Senator speaks? All the conferees could do would be to deal with the question of wage boards. There would be nothing else before the conference, so far as this amendment is concerned.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Could not the Senate conferees insist upon the Senate amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. They could insist upon the Senate amendment, but if the Senate amendment were adopted, unless there were a wage board to fix a certain salary or wage, the same evil would exist of which the Senator from Massachusetts now complains.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think so.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, I think it would.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senate amendment provides:

> No part of the moneys appropriated in this act shall be used for paying to any civilian employee of the United States Government, other than those whose pay is adjustable from time to time through wage boards or similar authority, an hourly wage or salary larger than that customarily paid by private individuals for corresponding work in the same locality.

Mr. LENROOT. Where there is no wage board, even though the Senate amendment were adopted, the same evil would exist.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator has called my attention to the omission of the language which formerly appeared in the original amendment, which did leave the matter to a wage board; but still the Senate amendment is very much broader and more satisfactory than the House provision.

Mr. LENROOT. It would cover cases where there were wage boards.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let me read the House provision. It is as follows:

> SEC. 2. No part of the moneys appropriated in this act shall be used for paying to any civilian employee of the United States Government an hourly wage or salary larger than that customarily paid by private individuals for corresponding work in the same locality.

Why is that language put into the bill if it is not intended to reduce wages? It is certainly not designed to increase wages. It is put into the bill purposely and deliberately to reduce the scale of wages of civilian employees who are working under the War Department to correspond to the wages of private employers paid on a per hour basis. Everybody knows that the Government has been more generous as to hours of labor than has any employer in private industry. Therefore, this proposed legislation means a reduction in wages—a very substantial reduction, I am informed—in the wages of a great many civilian employees of the War Department.

I repeat what I said. Let us not do this in a hidden way. Let us cut the wages by a direct vote, if that is desired, and tell the employees that we are doing so; but do not cut wages by a provision agreed to in a conference committee which looks innocent upon its face but which will absolutely mean a sweeping reduction in wages without any of the employees or their friends or anybody else having an opportunity to be heard.

That is the objection I am making.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we heard no objection from the employees of the navy yards and the arsenals when wages in the industries outside of yards adjacent to those institutions were increasing by leaps and bounds and the wages of the employees of the Government were being increased correspondingly. The provision as agreed to means that in the matter of wages the department will have to follow out the same law that is on the statute books to-day. The employees evidently are not willing now to follow the labor market down as they were willing to follow it up. That is all there is to this whole question. The matter was thrashed out when the appropriation bill was before the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator agree that the House provision means a reduction in wages?

Mr. SMOOT. I should think it would mean that the wage board will have the power to do, and will no doubt do, just as the law now on the statute books provides that they shall do when they meet; that is, to pay the wage that is paid for similar work outside of the Government service.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Are the wages paid to Government employees larger than those paid to private employees doing the same kind of work in the same locality?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; they are larger.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Very well. The Senator agrees, then, that the House provision means a reduction of their wages?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and the law as it stands on the statute books to-day would bring that about, if the wage board would meet at once. The wage board will not meet and pass upon the question until the fall, as Mr. Alifas told me, and, therefore, there will be nothing done until then, and the employees in the meantime will continue to draw the higher wages they have been drawing up to this time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Have not the wage boards the power to fix wages for Government employees at a less rate than is paid in private industry?

Mr. SMOOT. No; under existing law they have not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They have not such power and they can not take such action?

Mr. SMOOT. They can not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Where is the law which requires them to pay the same amount of wages to Government employees as are paid in private employment?

Mr. SMOOT. In the appropriation bills which have been passed by Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator call my attention to any act or law which requires a wage board to pay the same wage for Government work as that paid by private industries?

Mr. SMOOT. I think if the Senator will look at the appropriation bills of the last few years, at least since the war, he will find in every appropriation bill that such a provision has been made.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then why insert this provision if that is the general law now on the statute books?

Mr. SMOOT. In this appropriation bill, I think, it means that it shall not apply.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yet the Senator has just told me that, in his opinion, the House provision means a reduction of wages.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that the employees in the navy yards and the arsenals expect a reduction of wages; there is not any doubt about that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Why do not the wage boards reduce the wages?

Mr. SMOOT. They will this fall when they meet; and I am inclined to think they will have to meet, if this provision passes, and decide that question right away.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Are the wage boards in session now?

Mr. SMOOT. No; they are not in session.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Can they not be called in session?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know who would call them if this item is not adopted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So, because nobody will call the wage boards, because they can not be called together, Congress must pass a law attempting to regulate wages over the head of the wage boards?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is well known to the employees that the wage boards will not meet until next fall, and the employees do not want them to meet until the fall. I said to their representative, "If you want the wage board to meet, I will take the matter up with the President of the United States, and I will see that the board is called, if there is power in the President to call it," but they frankly said they did not want the board to meet; that they wanted their wages to remain just as they are. There is no wrong done by this provision to the employees, if they want to be paid as they have been paid in the past and on the same basis.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I think this question so important that I should like to have the yeas and nays upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON of Indiana in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report, on which the Senator from Massachusetts demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], but on this question I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is absent to-day. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but I am given to understand reliably that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I find that my general pair, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], is absent from the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MOSES. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. KEYES] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. May I inquire if the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. SMITH. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; and

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 58, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—58.

So the report was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
June 17, 1921.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 12, 13, 36, 38, 45, 46, 52, 54, and 55 to the bill (H. R. 5010) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," and concur therein.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 3, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by said amendment insert the following: ": Provided further, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to sell to any foreign State or Government with which the United States is at peace, upon such terms as he may deem expedient, any foodstuffs, now on hand and found to be surplus, which are not needed for military purposes, or which are likely to spoil, and for which there is no adequate domestic market."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 9, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

After the word "officers," where it occurs in lines 2 and 4 of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the words "and nurses."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 10, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate amendment insert the sum "$77,741,370."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 41, and concur therein with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: ": Provided further, That there may be transferred during the fiscal year 1922 from the appropriations contained herein for 'Subsistence of the Army,' 'Regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps,' 'Incidental expenses, Quartermaster Corps,' 'Water and sewers at military posts,' and 'Clothing and camp and garrison equipage,' to the appropriation for 'Transportation of the Army and its supplies,' such amounts as may be necessary."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, does the message that is sent over here embrace one amendment or a number of amendments?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Four amendments. In just a brief statement I think I can explain the situation.

The conference report which the Senate adopted a moment ago still left a number of items in disagreement. In the meantime, however, the House of Representatives has considered the conference report and has agreed to accept without change several of the amendments which had been originally proposed by the Senate, and to accept four others with further modifications.

The first one has to do with the authority given to the Secretary of War to sell surplus property to foreign States. The Senate provided that he should have authority to sell any sort of surplus property to any foreign State. The House has suggested an amendment to that, limiting the authority to the sale of foodstuffs to foreign States with which the United States is at peace. The Senate conferees have reached an understanding to the effect that they will ask the Senate to agree to that House amendment; and I therefore make that motion on that amendment now.

Mr. FLETCHER. In other words, the Senator moves to have the Senate concur in the House amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To concur in the House amendment, or agree to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the next one of the four amendments with which the House has come into agreement with an amendment is numbered 9. In that amendment the Senate authorized the ordering to active duty of officers of the Medical Reserve Corps for duty in Army hospitals to take care of war-risk insurance patients, and to be paid their salaries not out of Army funds but out of War Risk funds. The House gladly accepts that amendment, but also proposes to add the words "and nurses," so that Medical Reserve Corps nurses may be put upon active duty in addition to Medical Reserve Corps officers, and both be used in taking care of War Risk patients at the expense of War Risk funds; and I move that the Senate concur in that House amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the third and infinitely the most important amendment is now reached.

The House of Representatives originally appropriated for pay of enlisted men the sum of $72,678,659. The Senate, as Senators will remember, amended the provision of the House by striking out $72,678,659 and substituting $81,000,000. When the Senate did that, they did it upon the theory and with the desire that the Army should be reduced down to 150,000 men by normal processes—expirations of enlistment, resignations, disabilities, and any other normal process which would reduce the Army in the absence of all recruiting until it reached 150,000 men—and then be held there, at that strength, for the balance of the fiscal year. It would take until approximately the end of April or the 1st of May next to reach the figure of 150,000 by normal shrinkage.

The figure appropriated originally by the House would compel the Army to be reduced to 126,000 men within the next fiscal year. The conferees could not agree; the House conferees would not accept the $81,000,000 and the Senate conferees would not accept the $72,000,000. The House conferees stood pat, as it were, upon their $72,000,000, and submitted it to the House. The House thereupon voted to accept the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out $81,000,000 and substituting $77,741,370 for pay of enlisted men.

Mr. POMERENE. It was a compromise, was it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A compromise suggested by the House of Representatives itself.

Mr. POMERENE. What was the basis of the compromise?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Here is the effect: I said, I think, to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a little while ago that he is not the only person who suffers severe disappointments in this bill. If the figure $77,741,370 is finally agreed to—and I intend to ask that it be agreed to—as the item for pay of enlisted men, the Secretary of War must discharge between July 1 and October 1, 70,000 men from the Army to reduce it to 150,000 men on October 1, and to hold it at that strength for the rest of the fiscal year and still remain within the appropriation in accordance with the terms of the so-called Borah amendment. Of these 70,000 men who must leave the service, approximately 20,000 will leave the service by normal shrinkage, expirations of enlistment, and other causes.

Approximately 50,000 must be arbitrarily discharged before their terms of enlistment have expired. It is treatment administered to the Army which has never been administered before. In its cruelty, and I use that word advisedly, it surpasses anything that has ever been proposed, I think, in the Congress of this country.

Morally, it is a breaking of the contract with the man; technically, the Secretary of War is informed by his Judge Advocate General that he has the right, under the terms of the Borah amendment, to arbitrarily discharge a soldier, even though the soldiers' conduct may be good and his term of enlistment not expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator has anything upon which to base an answer, I would like to know the number of applications for discharge made by soldiers who want to be discharged. What is the number per month?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can tell the Senator what the record has been since January 1. Since January 1, out of an Army which has averaged in the neighborhood of 230,000, there have been 2,200 applications for discharge.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Each month?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the total number. The Secretary of War is limited in his authority, by existing law, and may grant an application only when the soldier proves a condition of dependency in his family. So of the 2,200 applicants approximately 1,500 have been discharged. The remaining 600 or 700 could not be discharged under the law. But when this bill passes the Secretary will have the authority to discharge those 600 or 700 and any other soldiers who voluntarily apply. How many will apply no one can tell. It is safe to say, however, that fewer are applying now than ever before in the history of the Army, proportionately.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I asked that question because I have had a good many applications sent to me by soldiers from my State who wanted to be discharged and whose parents, principally their mothers, thought they needed them at home to help in the farming.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They may go under this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, my State is an agricultural State. I have found exceeding great difficulty in getting the men out who wanted to be discharged from the Army. The Senator tells me that there is a rule about dependency.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a statute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, a statute. But when that statute comes in conflict with another statute providing for a reduction of the Army, it seems to me the easiest way to reduce the Army is to let the men who want to get out of it get out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is just what this bill does. The committee has anticipated the wishes of the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the way, I wish to add that a good many of those boys went into the Army when they thought their breasts would be needed as ramparts against a common enemy, and after the war was over they were tired of the routine of being ordered around and uplifted and nursed as if they were children.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator, appropos of the subject just discussed, whether there will be a reduction proportionately of the officers in the Army?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There will not be. They are short of officers now, and the appropriation will not permit them to materially increase the number of officers.

Mr. KING. Do I understand the Senator to state that after we have gotten the Army down to a basis of 150,000 men, we will still have an inadequate number of officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Army performs the missions confided to it by law, the number of officers will still be too low. If the Congress will repeal many of the acts which confide missions, and mandatorily so, upon the regular commissioned personnel, then you can reduce the number of officers; but so long as the law reads that officers shall be assigned to colleges and universities, shall be assigned as inspectors and instructors to the National Guard, shall do river and harbor work, and various other things, then you must have the officers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, the Senator from Utah suggests that we might possibly have an overadequate number of officers, and I wish to say that I hope we always shall have. If we are to keep up a peace establishment which might be turned into a war establishment upon short notice, the only way in the world to do it at the least expense possible to the people is to keep up as small an Army as possible, with as large a corps of trained commissioned officers as the skeleton of the Army permits.

I for one hope that there will be turned out every summer in the United States numberless men—I do not care how great their number may be—suited to take commissions as second or first lieutenants or captains in the future Army, and I hope that may be done by training in camps, and that we may not again have to go through three months of training to get officers in order to train the private soldiers six months longer. We can save in any great war at least three months of the preparation period by having a sufficient number of trained officers, and I hope that the peace Army of the United States will always be top-heavy in the lower grade of commissioned officers—second lieutenants, first lieutenants, and captains. If we have them we will always have the morale of the Army, and we always will have the capacity in the Army to train raw recruits in the shortest time possible.

I am very glad the bill does not make its main reduction in the commissioned personnel. Of course, I understand, as well as anybody could understand, that when you go before a popular audience and say that you are reducing the number of privates but multiplying the number of officers, that is very fine food for a fine pronunciamento of demagogy of one sort or another. But the truth is that, for a people who do not want to keep a standing Army, but who do want to keep comparatively well prepared for war, the best thing is always to have a superabundance of lower-rank commissioned officers who can train recruits. If it were possible to keep at the same time a superabundance of noncommissioned officers, that would be just as well, perhaps even better.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I will continue my statement, which will be very brief, and I hope to complete it without interruption, except as to matters having to do with this particular item.

As I was saying, it is with the greatest reluctance that I rise in my place and ask the Senate to approve of a proposition which will result in the arbitrary discharge from the Army of 50,000 men, the breaking of the moral contract entered into between them and the Government, the turning of those men loose on the streets without notice, and with no chance to prepare themselves for gainful occupation.

But, Mr. President, it must be done or there can be no bill, such is the attitude of the House of Representatives. I and my colleagues on the conference committee have canvassed the situation, and we have come to this unanimous conviction, that the House of Representatives can not be persuaded to appropriate one penny more than $77,741,370. It would be futile for me and the other conferees on the part of the Senate to ask the Senate to still insist upon its $81,000,000. We would go back into conference, and there we would sit in deadlock, and in the meantime those legislative provisions in this bill which, as soon as it is enacted, will result in saving large sums of money to the Government, would be delayed, nothing accomplished, and in the long run I believe we should have to come and meet the House, just as I propose that the Senate meet it to-day.

The discharge of 50,000 men arbitrarily, in addition to the 20,000 who will normally leave the service in the three months period, of course, will incapacitate the Army of the United States for any kind of service within this country for that period of time. No sensible man can deny that. I want to enter my personal protest against it, as a matter of public policy, and my protest against it as a matter of economy, on the purely dollars and cents side. When you reduce your Army to 150,000 men by October 1, you will then have to renew recruiting in order to maintain the Army at that figure for the remaining months in the year. The normal shrinkage per month will be between 4,000 and 5,000 men after October 1. So, to hold the Army at the figure of 150,000 for the months yet remaining in the year after October 1 you must recruit between 4,000 and 5,000 men per month, at a cost of $100 per man. In other words, you are firing out of the Army thousands and thousands of men, and turning around and immediately reenlisting them at a cost of $100 per man. We will not save more than $1,000,000, net, by that operation. But it is the best the Senate conferees can procure from the House at this session of Congress. We must have the legislation by July 1. It would be a pity and a disaster if we did not have it. Therefore, Mr. President, I move that the Senate concur in this amendment of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator answered the question which I asked him a few moments ago by giving the number of men who have actually, within a given time, applied for discharge. I have every reason to believe that that number is not one-tenth of the number of men who would have applied for discharge if they had had the slightest hope in their minds of securing their discharges. The number of men who were discontented, wanted to go home and help their fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters to raise crops upon the farms, which are needing laborers very much, was many times the number given by the Senator.

I think when the Senator says that this would result in arbitrarily cutting off from the Army 50,000 men, he is wasting his sympathy on the 50,000. I am not a prophet or the son of a prophet, but I venture to say right now that if the news goes broadcast in the Army that every man who wants to be discharged can be discharged, there will not be 10,000 of the 50,000 left.

The average American citizen does not much like the domineering air of the officer. He goes into the Army when great public need requires it, or when patriotism calls him; but in ordinary peace times he is trying to get out. I do not know what the average New York soldier in the Army, perhaps from the large cities, New York, Brooklyn, and Buffalo, may think, a class of men who have come into the Army for various reasons which do not prevail in my section of the country, but I know that the average private soldier in the Army from the State of Mississippi to-day wants to get out of it because he never joined it for a peace establishment, and would be very glad to get out.

I desire the prophecy which I now make, pseudo prophecy or quasi prophecy, or whatever it may be, to go upon the record, that if the War Department will announce that every private soldier who applies for a discharge shall have his discharge without proving dependency or anything else that there will not be 15,000 men discharged from the Army by the sole authority of the Secretary of War without their own volition. I am tempted to go a step further and say that there will not be one. In the present Army, in my opinion, there are at least 70,000 private soldiers who would like to get out of it.

The Senator tells me that in a given period there were only 2,200 discharges. The Senator knows, or perhaps he does not know, but I know in my section of the country that frequently I discourage an application to get out of the Army upon the ground that the boy has not the right cause to give under the law. If the Secretary of War will merely announce the general order and have it published in the newspapers that every private soldier in the Army who wants a discharge can have it until the Army is reduced to 150,000, I prophesy right now that he will get so many applications that he will have to terminate the notice within six months, and I dare him now to make that announcement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there is just one correction which I beg leave to make of one statement of the Senator. Of course this matter of the number of men who may apply for discharge is a matter of guesswork.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that, of course.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator can not make any better guess than I can, nor I than he; but the Senator has stated that many of the men in the Army to-day are there because they enlisted during the war to defend the country. That is not true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They either enlisted or reenlisted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator let me complete my statement?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Perhaps they reenlisted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But they reenlisted voluntarily.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know several of them who are there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As a matter of fact, they need not have reenlisted. Every man who is in the Army who enlisted in the service at the outbreak of the war against Germany has either left the Army or has reenlisted since the armistice. So they are not caught in the way the Senator suggested.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Perhaps the Senator is right about that, because his technical knowledge of the provisions of the bill is, of course, very much superior to my own; but I do know that a great many men in the Army want to get out who have not been able to get out. I have tried to help a lot of them out, and they were not able to get out even with my help. Of course, my help does not amount to much.

I undertake right now to predict that if the Secretary of War will announce to the country that every private soldier in the Army who wants to be discharged can get a discharge by making application within 60 days, he will not have to discharge arbitrarily, as the Senator said—I started to say 15,000 men, but I will say 1,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 10.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The fourth amendment which the House accepts with an amendment is No. 41. The Senate provided that the funds appropriated under the general heading "Quartermaster Corps" should all be regarded as one fund and should be administered as such with the effect that if a saving was made in one item that saving could be had for use under another subhead. The conferees on the part of the House refused to accept that "one-fund" provision, although it has been contained in the Army appropriation bills for several years past, insisting upon the itemization; but finally the House itself agreed, upon the request of their own conferees, to permit any saving made in the Quartermaster items to be used for transportation of troops and supplies, thereby making it possible, or more possible, for the Secretary of War to pay the enormous expense which is going to be charged to the transportation item as a result of this drastic reduction of the Army.

Under the law all the soldiers who are to be discharged have to be sent home with their expenses paid, and the average cost of sending a man home in continental United States is $55.88. The discharge of 70,000 men is going to cost over $3,500,000. I said a moment ago that there is no economy in this thing at all, and I prove it. In order to make it possible or barely possibly for the Secretary of War to meet this terrible burden thrust upon the transportation appropriation we permit him to use for that purpose any saving he can make out of other Quartermaster appropriations.

I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment to the Senate amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the Senator to say that it costs $55, on an average, to send a discharged soldier home?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much would it cost to keep him in the service a year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, much more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. About $1,400 per year, would it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under the pay item alone, it would cost $488.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So the plea that we are spending money uselessly by paying $55 to send a man home rather than to keep him in the service for a year at an expense of $1,400 is rather a "lame and impotent conclusion."

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has not taken into consideration all the facts. I can not quite admit that last charge of a "lame and impotent conclusion." The difficulty is that when we get down to 150,000 enlisted men in three months, we shall have to start recruiting again, and the recruiting costs over $100 per man. We are going to discharge the man and give him $55.88 to put in his pocket and then reenlist him at a cost of one hundred-odd dollars, with all the transportation piled upon that again, give him a new uniform, new clothing from top to bottom, and with only two or three or four months left in the fiscal year to make use of it. I claim we save nothing by that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The plea that we have to reenlist the man goes by the board, because by the Senator's own argument the man will not willingly retire and would not need to be reenlisted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The man has no choice. He is going to be fired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, not if he is going to be fired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He has to be fired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If he is fired, it will cost the Government $55 to send him home, and yet the Senator has said that it will cost the Government $1,400 to keep him in the service for another year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Nothing of the sort. It will cost $488 for a full year, and in the meantime a goodly portion of the year will have gone by. The pay is $488 on the average.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It costs at the rate of $1,400 a year to keep him in the Army, and that depends on how long he is kept in the Army. I remember before the war started it cost a thousand dollars to keep a man in the Army for a year, and I heard afterwards that the expense of keeping him in had gone up 40 per cent. Therefore I said $1,400. Of course, the Senator can not say that $55 per man amounts to as much as the pro rata share of $1,400, which would constitute his compensation for the number of months that he served in the Army before his enlistment expired.

As to reenlistment and all that, if the Army had such a hard time being reduced to 150,000 men as the Senator contends that it would have without arbitrarily doing injustice to a private soldier who, according to the Senator, wants to stay in and is awfully anxious to stay in, then why should anyone bother himself about the question of reenlistment, because we would have our 150,000 men who would all be anxious to stay, and who would all stay until the end of their terms?

The Senator shakes his head, but his head shakes in one direction and his voice wags in a different direction. As I understood him, he said the men did not want to leave the Army, that they would have to be arbitrarily put out, and that they would be floating upon the surface of circumstance for support. Now, he tells me that there will be an immense expense for the men who want to reenlist. Either one or the other position must be wrong. Either there are not all of these men, over the 150,000, who want to stay, or there are not all these men who want to reenlist. But whether they want to reenlist or not the cost of sending them home and the total cost of reenlistment and the total cost of uniforms and the total cost of everything else per man will not be one-fifth the cost per year of keeping the men in the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not for a year. It is only for the last few months of the fiscal year. That is the situation. The Senator seems to forget that a good portion of the year will already have gone by. It is only for the last few months of the fiscal year that we shall be keeping them in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that a good part of the year has already gone by, and that in consequence of that the Government has missed saving a lot of money that it might have saved if we had enacted this legislation six months ago.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was speaking of the next fiscal year, may I say to the Senator—not this year, but the next fiscal year. I am sorry I have such difficulty in making myself understood by the Senator. I almost suspect he does not wish to understand me. This thing will not occur until several months have gone by in the next fiscal year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that none of the next fiscal year has thus far gone by, at any rate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But we are appropriating for the next fiscal year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We come back to what the Senator said a moment ago as to this being a sort of guess as to what might happen. I have made my guess and he has made his. I venture to say that at the end of two years the Senator will admit that my guess was better than his.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am sure the chairman of the committee inadvertently made a statement that he does not wish to have appear upon the RECORD, wherein he said that it costs the Government only $488 per year per man to keep men in the Army. The chairman, of course, meant for pay.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For pay. I was only discussing the matter of pay.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, the cost to the Government for a soldier who remains in the service is much more than $480 per year.

In addition, I can not agree with the chairman that there will be the amount of recruiting the chairman speaks of after the 1st of October. Presumably, in making these arbitrary discharges the Secretary of War would, as a matter of economy, discharge those whose terms would expire during the fiscal year. It clearly would be his duty to do so. Therefore, when we get the Army reduced to 150,000 men the number then remaining whose terms of enlistment would expire during that fiscal year will be comparatively few, certainly nothing like the enormous number of expirations of enlistments. So, in my judgment, there will not be anything like the expense of recruiting that the chairman referred to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I be informed of the parliamentary situation? I am of the opinion that this brings the legislation to a conclusion. The Senate having concurred in the amendments presented by the House as evidenced in the message from the House, it avoids further conference, and if I am not very much mistaken the bill may now proceed through the usual channels to the Chief Executive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has taken final action on the bill.

CONDITIONS IN THE COAL FIELDS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution No. 80.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution, which, as amended June 13, 1921, was read as follows:

Whereas conditions of violence at present exist along the border between West Virginia and Kentucky; and

Whereas for a long period in the past in the coal fields of West Virginia there have been disturbed conditions which have led to turbulence and violence and bloodshed; and

Whereas the conditions referred to are a menace to orderly democratic government and to the general safety and welfare of the people living in the territory affected: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, or any subcommittee thereof, to be appointed by it, is hereby authorized and directed to make a thorough and complete investigation of the conditions existing in the coal fields of West Virginia, in the territory adjacent to the border of West Virginia and Kentucky; that said committee ascertain the causes of the recent acts of violence upon said border and of the conditions which have existed and do now exist in the said coal fields, and generally investigate thoroughly the causes which have led to conditions which have obtained in the past and which now exist in said territory and report its findings and conclusions thereon to the Senate. The committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit at such time and place as it may deem necessary; the expenses of said investigation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move the amendment to the preamble of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed to the preamble of the resolution by the Senator from California will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the preamble of the resolution so as to read:

Whereas there have been conditions of violence in the coal fields along the border between West Virginia and Kentucky: Therefore be it

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the preamble is agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I stepped out of the Chamber a moment ago for the purpose of answering a call on the telephone, and I understand that during my absence the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] called up for consideration what is known as the West Virginia coal investigation resolution, which was passed. There are several Senators who, I have understood, desire to be heard on the resolution, and I give notice that I shall move to reconsider the vote whereby it was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, in speaking of the legislation in relation to the coal industry I desire to say that, of course, there is a great deal of opposition to it among certain of the coal operators and wholesalers and retailers. I have received a great many telegrams in opposition to the so-called coal bills. There is another side of the story, however. I have also received many letters from consumers of coal complaining of present conditions. I shall not undertake to insert all of these communications in the RECORD. I have simply selected three examples to place in the RECORD, which have been reflected many times over during the past two years that the subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee has been investigating this subject. Here is a letter from Rahway, N. J., which is dated June 6, 1921, and reads:

Hon. JOSEPH FRELINGHUYSEN.

HONORABLE AND DEAR SIR: We can not pay the present price of coal per ton $13.50 and the advancing cost to October. What are the poor people to do when winter comes? It is an awful thing to be cold. You have no more important duty to the country than to see the people do not suffer for want of coal through its exorbitant cost. I hope you will not think me presumptuous in this, but I do feel a horror of the coming winter.

Sincerely and respectfully,

JOHN E. CONNOLLY.

I read also a telegram which is signed by W. J. Payne, of Richmond, Va.:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 8, 1921.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN,
Washington, D. C.:

I have always been strongly opposed to legislative regulation of business, but your proposal to regulate the coal industry—producer and dealer—and protect public against the worst extortion existing in this country to-day will receive universal approval. With mine price of $3 and freight of less than $2.60 net ton, the people of Richmond are forced to pay $13 per net ton for soft coal. Complaint is universal and Congress should give relief.

I also read a letter from Secretary Hoover, of the Department of Commerce, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, June 13, 1921.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I take the liberty of inclosing to you another letter as a sample of the kind the department is receiving from day to day; but I have no doubt that you are receiving them also.

Faithfully, yours,

HERBERT HOOVER.

This is the letter inclosed by Secretary Hoover:

NEW YORK, June 9, 1921.

HERBERT HOOVER, Esq.

DEAR SIR: Approximately 6,000 families in New Rochelle, Westchester County, N. Y., want to buy their winter's supply of coal, but there would appear to be a coal ring, all the local dealers quoting the same prices, namely, $14 to $15 a ton, according to size.

Quotations by your department in the local papers, Evening Standard and Press, of the cost of egg, stove, nut, and pea coal at the mines, and the freight rate to New York, would enable the people to know if the present prices are fair, and if so, they would place their orders; and if not, pitiless publicity would pull down the price.

This is a public duty for the citizens and the coal miners who are out of work.

Count on me for any assistance.

J. PRYSE GOODWIN.

Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD certain telegrams and letters which have been received by me from time to time supporting the legislation with reference to seasonal coal rates. The first telegram is from the Southern Ohio Coal Exchange, and is signed by W. B. McKinney, secretary.

I may say that some of these telegrams relate to the original bill which was introduced which provided for specific differentials. The bill has been amended and now gives broad powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission to make such seasonal rates on coal as in their judgment they may deem advisable without limiting their jurisdiction. I also present telegrams and letters from Pickands, Brown & Co.; from the Milwaukee Coke & Gas Co.; from the Springfield Traffic Association, of Springfield, Ohio; from the Rome Coal Co., of Columbus, Ohio; from the Chamber of Commerce of Dubuque, Iowa; from the Cumberland County Gas Co., of Millville, N. J.; from the Heller & Merz Co., of Newark, N. J.; from the Utah Coal Producers' Association, of Salt Lake City, Utah, together with a copy of their resolution; from the Penn Fuel Co., of No. 1 Broadway, New York; from the Society for Visual Education (Inc.), of Chicago, Ill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Do those communications refer to the seasonal rate bill or to the other bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They refer to the seasonal rate bill. I am speaking of that measure.

I also present letters and telegrams from commercial traffic managers of Philadelphia, of Wilmington, Del.; the Oklahoma Industrial Traffic League, of Oklahoma City, Okla.; the Milwaukee Coke & Gas Co., of Milwaukee, Wis.; the Lower Lignite Coal Mining Co., of Middlesboro, Ky.; the Chamber of Commerce of Creston, Iowa; Thomas S. Watson & Co., engineers, Milwaukee; and I. A. Barber & Son, Indianapolis, Ind.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these communications to which I have referred, together with certain resolutions and newspaper clippings, be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, June 20, 1921.

Senator JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Referring to your Senate bill 1807, to aid in stabilizing the coal industry, the Southern Ohio Coal Exchange, as expressed in its declaration of purposes, as well as by acts and resolutions in the past, has been ready and willing at all times to cooperate with the State and Federal authorities in the endeavor to stabilize the mining industry, particularly as to southern Ohio, and to that end has been willing to furnish information as to mining, distribution, transportation, and the sale of coal. It is therefore proper and consistent with our past and present position to cooperate with you, the Federal Government, and its officers in their endeavor to perfect such legislation as may be necessary to accomplish the objects of your bill, namely, the stabilization of the coal industry, it always being understood that all legislation shall safeguard data and information which would separately disclose the business transactions of any person, as indicated in your bill.

Senator JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We wired you to-day regarding a bill reported to have been introduced by you to stabilize coal production and distribution by the establishment of seasonal freight rates.

Our telegram was to request the inclusion of coke in your bill. This commodity has become a household fuel in this middle western district, and it is equally important to stimulate its movement during the summer months.

We hope, therefore, you will make this addition to your bill.

THE SPRINGFIELD TRAFFIC ASSOCIATION,
Springfield, Ohio, April 20, 1920.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Through your courtesy we have duly received copy of Senate bill 4087, introduced by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, providing for what is popularly known as "seasonal coal rates."

The board of directors of this association, whose membership embraces practically all of the shippers and receivers of freight in the city of Springfield, has carefully considered the provisions of this bill and has unanimously approved the same.

The writer has been instructed to communicate this information to you. We respectfully solicit your favorable consideration and support.

Yours, truly,

G. L. CORY, Manager.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, May 15, 1920.

United States Senator FRELINGHUYSEN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I write to express my conviction that the enactment into law of your seasonal freight rate plan, as outlined in Senate bill No. 4278, will permanently benefit and stabilize the coal industry.

These seasonal freight charges ought to be based, in my judgment, on a sliding scale.

The enactment of this proposed legislation is bound to aid all concerned—the public, the miners and mine owners, the railroads, and the manufacturers.

It will provide the means to permanently establish fair selling prices during both the summer and winter seasons and insure to the miners steady employment at all times provided the railroads are obliged to and actually furnish the cars.

Railroads will be helped by this legislation as it will greatly lessen the burden now placed on them by the usual adverse climatic conditions during the winter months. When coal is in greatest demand, the roads can not then haul 50 per cent of the tonnage which they can transport during the summer months at much less cost.

This law would benefit the miners and mine owners by shifting the now usual winter pressure for coal to the summer months. The summer output would be doubled at half the cost.

This is not mere guesswork or a case where the individual or personal wish is the parent of the thought expressed. These statements are made because seasonal mining rates have been tried in the Hocking Valley, in this State, during two years from April 1, 1874, to April 1, 1876, and the mining rates then in force caused that valley to blossom and prosper as she has never prospered before or since.

The miners were kept very busy during the four summer months, filling Lake contracts. During the two spring and two fall months the railroads and manufacturers kept the mines busy and during the four winter months the demands from the domestic markets gave the miners all the business they could handle. In short, the arrangement, as outlined above, proved to be a blessing to all, and the Hocking Valley and her miners lost out when that contract was not renewed.

The contract in force during the two years provided for a yearly average mining rate of 75 cents per ton for pick mining. During March and April the rate paid was 75 cents. During May, June, July, and August the rate was 62½ cents per ton. During September and October the rate was 75 cents, and in November, December, January, and February the rate paid was 87½ cents per ton, thus making the yearly average mining rate 75 cents.

The writer himself was mining coal during that period as well as before and for some years later. Everybody was satisfied and a renewal of the contract was hoped for. Nonunion men had signed the original contract. All miners who desired work were requested to subscribe to the terms of that contract. By the time the contract expired the union membership had grown to proportions that would not be denied and these forces were against a renewal.

The seasonal mining rates have proven their real value. What the seasonal mining rates did for the Hocking Valley is an established fact, which indicates to me that seasonal freight rates will accomplish very much more for the benefit of our great country.

Your proposal, in my judgment, is fundamentally sound and pregnant with great good.

Very truly, yours,

THE ROME COAL CO.,

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Dubuque, Iowa, May 21, 1920.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN,
Senate Chambers, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The board of trustees have considered Senate file No. 4278, which is designed to equalize the coal-mining season and give steady employment in the mines. We have decided that this bill is worthy of our indorsement. The coal situation in the United States is extremely serious, and action should not be delayed until the winter months are upon us. Steady production at the mines the year round will largely relieve the coal shortage and the unrest among miners.

We are therefore asking you to give this bill your support and to do all in your power to secure its passage.

Yours, very truly,

MILLVILLE, N. J., May 20, 1920.

Senator JOSEPH FRELINGHUYSEN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We see that you have introduced in the Senate of the United States bills S. 4088 and S. 4278, one in regard to differential rates of freight in the summer time and the other to prevent the confiscation of utility companies' coal when in transit.

We presume that it is not necessary for us to write you on this subject, but we wish to say to you that both bills are good bills and meet with our approval and that we hope you will continue to urge the passage of these bills and that you will finally succeed.

We are also writing to say that we will do all in our power, with the other Senators and Congressmen, to support these measures, as they are both needed by utility corporations to a great extent.

BOARD OF TRADE,
128 Market Street, Newark, N. J.
(Attention of Mr. C. J. Fagg.)

GENTLEMEN: In reply to yours of May 7 in reference to Senate bill No. 4087 on the subject of seasonal coal freight rates: We are not familiar with the terms of the bill introduced by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, but judge of it from the context of your letter.

It has been our policy for years to buy coal during the summer months. We were fortunately situated in having plenty of yard space. The advantages of buying in the late spring, summer, and early fall months have been sufficient to justify the extra handling involved.

1. We never received frozen cars.
2. Cars came in promptly.
3. We were never in danger of a shutdown, due to lack of fuel.

In conversation with many manufacturers, the writer has urged this policy, and was astonished to find that many manufacturers were reluctant to invest the amount of money necessary, and to go to the expense of rehandling the coal. They took their chances on coal deliveries during the winter season.

We believe that the plan of a differential freight rate will be an extra bonus on being foresighted. It will be a relief to the railroads. It will in that way help every shipper, and the plan is to be commended on that account.

It must be borne in mind, however, that there are many industries so located that they can not store their winter supply of coal if received in the summer months. Industries located in the city can hardly take in four months' supply, and the differential between summer and winter freight rates must be so proportioned as not to work undue hardship.

Yours, truly,

THE HELLER & MERZ CO.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
Chairman of Subcommittee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We to-day wired you, as per inclosed confirmation of telegram, quoting resolution unanimously adopted in meeting of our association yesterday, in which our members have placed themselves on record as favoring the enactment of legislation, such as proposed in your pending bill, providing for seasonal freight rates on coal.

Being unable to appear in person at the hearings now being conducted by your committee on this bill, we take this opportunity of placing before your committee the views of our membership who produce four-fifths of the tonnage shipped from Utah mines.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, April 22, 1920.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Utah Coal Producers' Association, whose members produce 4,000,000 tons annually, in meeting yesterday adopted by unanimous vote the following resolution favoring seasonal freight rates:

"Whereas the States of Washington, Oregon, California, Nevada, Idaho, Utah, and part of Montana are largely dependent for their coal supply upon the mines operated in the State of Utah; and

"Whereas the coal consumers of the Western States dependent upon Utah mines for their fuel supply have undergone great suffering and damage through inability to obtain sufficient coal during the fall and winter months, caused by failure to store during the spring and summer months and by shortage of cars and labor during the fall and winter months; and

"Whereas the failure to store coal during the spring and summer months is due entirely to the want of proper differentials in freight rates sufficient in amount to cover interest on investment, insurance, double handling of coal, and deterioration; and

"Whereas we believe the adoption of seasonal freight rates on coal as provided in a bill recently introduced in the United States Senate by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN will be the means of greatly stabilizing the coal industry and relieving the conditions set forth herein by stimulating summer storage on the part of dealers and consumers, thus providing more uniform operation of the mines throughout the year, increasing production, reducing the average cost of coal per ton, relieving the car situation during the periods of great demand, improving the labor situation by protecting the miners from loss of time caused by lack of orders during spring and summer months, and insuring the public an ample supply of coal during the severe winter weather: Now, therefore be it, and it is hereby,

"Resolved, That the Utah Coal Producers' Association and all of the members thereof favor the enactment of legislation providing for seasonal railroad freight rates on coal and providing proper differentials to encourage the shipment of coal during the spring and summer months; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be telegraphed to Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, chairman of subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, United States Senate, which is now conducting hearings on this question, and that copies of this telegram be mailed to the Utah Representatives in the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington, urging their support of the measure when the same comes up for consideration."

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read with interest your advocacy of lower rates for summer shipments of coal, which I favor strongly, as it is just a simple way of getting enough hay in, while you can handle it, to last for the hard period of winter; but I would also like to have you see or ask these coal railroad men and operators, if you think it a wise thing to do, that if in the year 1918, when the largest production of bituminous coal was mined and transported, and this in a period of war, when the Government had thousands of urgent shipments of essential commodities for manufacturing of war material and shipbuilding, moving men and equipment, etc., and that since 1918, with the motive power that has been turned over to the railroads by the Government, cars, equipment, etc., the railroad should be in better shape to transport coal to satisfy the needs of the country now than in the above period?

It looks to me as if there is some little manipulation and somebody is mussing with the cards.

Yours, very truly,

JOSEPH P. O'CONNOR.

SOCIETY FOR VISUAL EDUCATION (INC.),

THE BLACK DIAMOND,
431 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

GENTLEMEN: I have before me your issue of the 24th, under the caption "Seasonal freight rate plan discussed." I desire to make comment.

How could it be possible to precipitate chaos in the present coal-rate structure, for in several cases they are not in keeping with the distance involved nor the terminals through which they are handled, and are all out of proportion to the service involved?

As to the present differentials which, it is alleged, could not be disturbed without serious effect, that is all bosh, for they could be reduced proportionately on the basis of a seasonal rate just the same as they were arrived at on the present rate basis. I am of the opinion that this matter has not been properly weighed.

There is mention of equity between coal-producing groups and fair and reasonable rates to the consumers. This in many instances does not exist at the present time, and the subject should be given serious thought by some conservative person of sound thinking and reasoning.

The car supply should be so arranged that every mine would have an equal chance. What difference does it make who gets the coal? It is up to the operator to fill his contracts, and the price he receives at the mine is just the same, whether the coal is consumed within the district in which it is mined or travels hundreds of miles distant from the point of production.

Relative to the question of discrimination by the coal operator: If he were instructed (providing such instructions were necessary) to apply an equal percentage of his orders to the various districts, this would eliminate it. The fellow in Manitoba needs coal just the same as the fellow who is at the mouth of the mine. As to a greater decrease in the car supply at the mines, this would be impossible. For instance, how often do the mines work three days per week? The mines I have in mind rarely work more than twice per week. The railroads, so they say, are always short of cars.

Regarding the excessive demand for delivery during the low-rate period, the answer is, you can not get blood out of a crab. In the history of railroading thus far they never have been able to supply the required amount of cars in any one given day. It can not be done, for were it possible it would cause a blockade and the situation would be a hard one to handle, regardless of the size of the line.

The subject of storing coal in the summer for the winter supply is a question which should be given much thought, for coal, unless properly stored, deteriorates very rapidly. Also, the cost of storage must be considered, and the question arises, Would the difference in the freight rate warrant the loss and expense thus sustained? As to the general storage, why, just as in any other business, the concerns who expand should not be tempered by ones who do not. I can remember a few years back when the railroads, on certain commodities, every summer reduced the rate to attract the commodity to storage points, in order that during the winter months the commodity could be nearer the point of consumption. There was no cry then of discrimination. Why should there be now, for things can be equalized now as well as then?

Regarding the car supply, naturally the more coal moved in the summer months would have a tendency to relieve in a measure the open-top equipment to the loading of such other commodities which require this kind of equipment.

In conclusion, would say that some of the arguments as set forth in your issue above referred to are open to attack and could be shot full of holes. This, however, is a serious question, and should be given careful consideration. In my opinion the bill as presented by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, with a few changes and proper amendment, would be a good one, and I sincerely hope that it will be adopted.

Very truly,

W. C. VAN ALLEN,

COMMERCIAL TRAFFIC MANAGERS OF PHILADELPHIA,
Wilmington, Del., April 15, 1920.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Commercial Traffic Managers of Philadelphia, representing many important shippers in the Philadelphia rate basis territory, at their last meeting indorsed the bill submitted to the Senate by you on behalf of the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce amending section 15 of the interstate commerce act to provide for seasonal coal rates.

We fully believe with you in its beneficial effects. Letters are being addressed to the Senators representing the Philadelphia rate basis territory urging their support of the bill.

Yours, very truly,

CHARLES A. BAMBERGER,
Chairman Legislative Committee, Traffic Manager

THE OKLAHOMA INDUSTRIAL TRAFFIC LEAGUE,
Oklahoma City, Okla., April 27, 1920.

Hon. J. S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
Member of Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am herewith inclosing a resolution passed by the Oklahoma Industrial Traffic League at its April meeting last Saturday relative to the bill which you have introduced relative to seasonal rates on coal.

It was the consensus of opinion of all members of the league that such legislation would greatly stimulate the production of coal the year round and would be of material assistance and help to the coal operators in operating the mines, as well as give more steady employment to the miners and permit them to realize a better living wage by being able to work more than at the present time.

The proposed legislation would be of great help to the carriers in that it would tend to keep coal cars moving during the summer months, whereas they now stand idle for days at a time, and then when the cold weather begins the coal-car shortage is felt.

The league was unanimously in favor of the resolution, and earnestly hope that Congress will pass the legislation.

Yours, very truly,

H. C. MCCORD, Secretary.

Resolution.

Whereas it is apparent that the wide seasonal fluctuations in the supply and demand for coal should be equalized by a more even distribution of demand throughout the different months of the year; and

Whereas in the Oklahoma coal-producing fields and the territory served by the Oklahoma mines the normal demand for coal is much greater than production during the winter months and very much below production during the spring and summer months; and

Whereas manufacturing industries, the carriers, the retail coal dealers, and consumers alike have been strongly urged to equalize demand by storing reserved supplies during the spring and summer months; and

Whereas the fairest and most effective way to accomplish stabilization of demand, in our opinion, is by means of graduated, seasonal freight rates and mine prices; and

Whereas it has been for years and is still the policy of the Oklahoma coal producers to graduate their prices to encourage and stimulate the early buying and storing of fuel, and believing that on account of increased cost and selling price and increased volume of freight rates applicable to coal a greater financial inducement to manufacturers, dealers, and consumers is necessary to encourage and justify the storage of coal in advance of the needs for same:

Now, therefore, we, the Oklahoma Industrial Traffic League, at this meeting urge the Congress of the United States to enact a law to provide for graduated, seasonal coal rates, the effect of which will be to make applicable reductions in the prevailing base rate, as follows:

	Cents.
On shipments made in February	10
On shipments made in March	25
On shipments made in April	25
On shipments made in May	25
On shipments made in June	15
On shipments made in July	5 and that in order to compensate the carriers for loss of revenue brought about by these reductions that carriers be authorized to add to the prevailing base rate in effect from time to time the following amounts per ton:

	Cents.
On shipments made in August	5
On shipments made in September	15
On shipments made in October	25
On shipments made in November	25
On shipments made in December	25
On shipments made in January	10

Resolved further, That the secretary of this organization forward a copy of this resolution to the chairmen of the Interstate Commerce Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission at Washington, and also to the traffic officials of the various railroads participating in the transportation of coal to points in Oklahoma and Texas.

H. C. MCCORD, Secretary.

Senator J. S. FRELINGHUYSEN,

We request your bill establishing seasonal rates on coal be amended to include coke. Coke is extensively used as domestic fuel in this middle western district. We always make lower summer rates to stimulate summer movement, and any railroad rate changes to help summer movement should also apply to coke.

Middlesboro, Ky., March 19, 1920.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to seasonal freight rates on coal, it would be better to leave two months in winter (January and February) unchanged and two months in summer (July and August) unchanged.

This would avoid a sudden change in the plus 15 per cent to the minus 15 per cent rates.

In the way the subject is now arranged it would tend to make the month before the raise very active and the first month after the raise dull. There would also be a dull month just before the decrease of 30 per cent occurred.

I am in favor of the plan. It would help the railroads as well as the mine operator and miners.

As far as this field is concerned, the rates shown on inclosed list of months would be the best.

Yours, truly,

W. E. GUNN.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

MILWAUKEE, March 27, 1920.

Senator JOSEPH SHERMAN FRELINGHUYSEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your bill for seasonal coal rates, I wish to say that I have given this matter considerable study and have reported on the conditions to a number of coal operators and users of coal.

The seasonal rates do not accomplish the desired results unless suitable storage plants are provided. As you are well aware, there is considerable coal stored at ports on the Great Lakes in large quantities up to 1,000,000 tons on single docks, and this plan, I think, is quite wrong though it answers the purpose to a certain extent.

Have advised a system of district and industrial storage which would store the coal in smaller quantities and nearer to the ultimate users.

Have estimates and recommendations which I would be glad to give you or to anyone that you suggest.

I am strongly in favor of your bill and am writing to our Senators and Congressmen accordingly.

Yours, very truly,

T. S. WATSON.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., March 26, 1920.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: While we know this is but one small voice in the millions you represent, we could not but write you after reading of your bill introduced in Congress in regard to a reduction of freight rates on coal during the spring and summer months and an addition in freight rates during the winter months.

We know this is the very best bill that has been introduced in Congress relating to coal in any way.

We don't mean to throw any bouquets, but this bill shows more gray matter used in the framing of it than any piece of legislation on coal that has ever been before Congress.

You have put the incentive there that will make the coal users act at the time when they need to act to get the most out of the labor, equipment, etc., of the entire force from the time the coal leaves the ground until it goes into the furnace.

Your bill solves more problems at one stroke than anything that has yet come up—you are striking right at the foundation of the high cost of coal, viz, labor could work for a lower wage and make more money in a year if employed steady; the operator can afford to make a reduction parallel to your freight rate, with a raise during winter, in order to give his mines steady running time; the retailer can do the same thing and make more money on a less profit per ton than he is now getting if he can use his labor, capital, and equipment equally over the entire 12 months of the year; and the sum of all of this is, more money per year for the miner, more money per year for the operator, more money per year for the railroads, more money per year for the retailer, and less per ton to the consumer for his coal because we can all use the greatest amount of efficiency in handling our business under your bill.

We wish to thank you for your effort in behalf of everyone affected by your bill—which is every American citizen; it is the only logical way to get the highest working power out of every unit, and we heartily pray that this bill may pass, and we believe it will.

Again we thank you.

Yours, truly,

Hon. FRELINGHUYSEN.

HONORABLE AND DEAR SIR: I clipped the following from the editorial page of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of March 18, 1920:

They seem to forget that there is several ways that the price of hard coal can be reduced. I would call your attention to the report of a senatorial committee that visited our district about one year ago and one corporation for one opening swore, if the daily papers are true, that they paid some $660,000 royalty to the greatest octopus in the State of Pennsylvania, namely, the Girard estate. We notice that the land is assessed at a few hundred dollars per acre, and always kicking at paying a few dollars tax to keep the schools in proper repair, etc.; in fact, the district is away in debt, and only a 9-month term.

We claim if they can get ten times the value of the valuation in one year that the royalty should at least be either cut in half or half the royalty should go to the school district that the operation is in. Stove coal is $7.45 in your cellar right here at the mine.

COMMITTEE.

STOCKING THE COAL BIN.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN'S prospectus of a 30 per cent reduction in the summer price of coal to the consumer, to be secured by enforcing a 15 per cent reduction in transportation rates during the summer and penalizing winter traffic at a similar rate, is alluring, but the plan lacks a surety of its promise.

The objective is to be commended. Hand-to-mouth production and distribution of such an essential as coal, which leaves even a community within as easy reach of the mines as is Philadelphia subject to a scarcity of supply which may develop into actual famine because of a temporary embargo resulting from a strike or storm, is obvious folly.

After the trying experience of the winter of 1917, the consumer appeared to have learned the lesson, and the 1st of the succeeding October there was probably a larger stock of coal in the household bins of Philadelphia—and in other communities as well—than there ever had been at that time of the year before.

Last year there was a slackening of the summer orders from the mass of consumers, and this year, with the prospect of the abandonment of the preferential spring prices, which for some years had stimulated early buying, the results bid fair to be even less satisfactory. The fear of advancing prices now seems to be the chief incentive on which reliance is placed for encouraging the virtue of forehandedness.

The scheme of the seasonal price was wholly logical. The individual who stocked his coal bin in the spring of the year, relieved the distributor of his carrying charges, interest on the investment, and storage costs, and, moreover, enabled delivery at a minimum expense. He was fairly entitled to his discount from winter prices and might reasonably have been granted more than the 50 cents a ton which was the maximum concession.

But if this natural business arrangement is to be withdrawn, popular interest in the proposed modification in transportation rates is not likely until the promised results can be traced with a degree of certainty.

[From the New York Commercial, Apr. 26, 1920.]

THE QUESTION OF SEASONAL COAL RATES.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN, of New Jersey, is making an earnest attempt to avert further troubles of coal shortage in the winter months. His idea is that there should be seasonal freight rates established to make summer shipments more attractive in order to pile up reserves in the months of light consumption.

The Senator's intentions are highly commendable, but it is not at all certain that the method he proposes would accomplish the desired object. In the present demoralized state of rail transportation it is doubtful if anything more can be hoped for than a continuation of a steady movement of coal from the mines. To stimulate it above the recent average is likely to be almost impossible of accomplishment, because of the shortage of railway cars.

It is a notable fact that during the period of Government operation equipment repairs were kept down to a minimum, and now that the present owners have got the roads back in their own control they find a great deal of equipment that must be scrapped, and a great deal more that has had to be withdrawn from service for elaborate repairs. Railroad workshops are swamped with repair work, and a great deal of it has had to be turned over to the car-building concerns as the quickest way of getting these cars back into service.

Those who oppose Senator FRELINGHUYSEN'S plan declare that the law of supply and demand can be depended upon to regulate shipments. Mr. E. H. Hurd, representing the Pittsburgh Vein Operators' Association, of Ohio, adhered to this view, declaring that we got along pretty well before we began to regulate business. It is quite true that the law of supply and demand can be depended upon, except when supply is influenced by outside conditions, such as strikes and severe weather.

It depends entirely upon how this natural law is to be applied. Abnormal conditions affecting supply must necessarily regulate shipments as well as prices. On the other hand, if demand can be stimulated in the off months it will be of substantial benefit to shippers as well as consumers.

Governmental investigations have revealed the fact that at times mine operators have curtailed production, in instances to one day a week, in order that they could trade on a short market. The labor element has come in for a great deal of condemnation for its absolute disregard for public necessities, but while this may be absolutely true it does not follow that the operators themselves are sprouting wings.

Government interference with private business should, on general principles, be decried, but if private enterprise mismanages public necessities and can be reached only through Government regulation the matter assumes a different aspect. Every case must be judged upon its individual merits in the light of the greatest benefit to the community.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have gone far enough into the details of the coal industry to know that the subject is so vast and so complex that it can not have too careful, too extensive, or too detailed consideration, not only by a few committees but by every member of this body. Indeed, the vital importance of the subject is my reason for asking your indulgence to-day while I discuss it.

While public hearings by the committee of which I was chairman were suspended in May of last year, I continued through personal efforts to keep closely in touch with every development in the coal trade. This intensive study has brought to light certain facts not generally known. However, they are in the main merely details of the larger story which you all know. These details have persuaded me that what happened after the middle of May was but a natural expression of tendencies which our committee had noted in the coal trade and had studied carefully in the spring. Indeed, I go so far as to say that we not only understood them but knew the causes from which they sprang. There was nothing new in the coal situation in 1920, except a set of external factors. The response of the unstable coal trade and of the uninformed consuming public to those factors was the same as it always had been, the same as it always will be, unless some form of harmonious cooperation between the interests involved can be worked out by the Congress, unless something is done to stabilize this industry. We knew that the bituminous coal industry is poorly organized, that it lacks leadership, that it can not unite in support of a constructive policy. We foresaw clearly that when a peculiar set of circumstances, to which I shall refer later, produced a temporary shortage the producers and dealers of coal would be unable to keep prices within reason. We knew that the many large and responsible operators who preferred to do business conservatively would be unable to hold in line other operators whose consciences set no limit to what they would accept for coal. We knew that with the customary restraints of competition broken down the large sober element in the coal industry would be unable to check looting by the irresponsible element. On the other hand, we had come to know the state of ignorance prevailing among the buyers of coal. We realized that if the coal trade was without unified leadership the consumers were a helpless mob. We saw that there was no agency of Government responsible for informing the public, no responsible officer to whom the coal-buying public might come for counsel and assistance. When weaknesses are present in a machine it is not surprising to see it break under a strain. Therefore, when our committee had realized the fundamental weaknesses in our national coal economy we were not surprised to see $20 coal in August.

Because the members of our committee have studied all phases of this industry—the normal as well as the abnormal—and because we believe we understand the subject, we have faith to believe that we can prescribe a remedy which will prevent the abnormalities without injuring a great industry.

I desire to attack this great problem, if I can, without showing passion toward and certainly without becoming a partisan of the men who are to-day the responsible managers of the coal industry. Individuals are temporary influences at best. They soon pass on, leaving the problem behind. I can not consent, therefore, to decide a great question on merely the evidence as to the conduct of the men who temporarily control a situation. Whatever else I do, I must see the problem by the light of the obligations which rests upon me, a sworn officer of this Government. I want, if I can so far dissociate myself from the violent passions aroused by recent practices, to discuss this question from the point of view: What is the proper relation which a vital natural resource sustains to the people?

This is distinct, as I see it, from the point of view of those who are trying to make money out of coal. It is quite different from the view of those who were recently struggling to pay a less price for their coal. Both of these partisans would, if left alone, destroy their own best interests by giving rein to their selfishness. The coal men would gouge the people until they lost their properties, and the people out of revenge would turn the coal mines over to political management, and pay a fearful price forever thereafter. Thus, by abandoning the point of view of both I believe I truly serve both; so I want to study the problem that is involved in establishing a proper relationship between an essential fuel and the people rather than trying to arbitrate a clothesline quarrel between buyer and seller.

I confess to you frankly that it is a difficult task to get at the most simple fact about coal. Volumes upon volumes have been written on the subject, but in the main they are merely words. Learned men talk volubly about coal, but in the end you get few or no undisputed figures or facts.

I am frank to say to you, touching recent happenings, that the buyers of coal have, in their resentment against prices, grossly overstated some situations the simple truth about which was bad enough. They have studiously left the impression that the total tonnage was purchased at the highest price they paid for any single lot of coal.

I am sorry to say that the coal producers and dealers, when driven to defend themselves, have resorted to the deception of quoting averages. In an effort to defend themselves they have completely wiped out the high prices which are known to have been paid. Indeed, in some instances their averages come so close to the prices at which coal commonly sold on contract that they lead one to believe that the average was figured on contract sales alone, ignoring the high "spot" market quotations.

In what I shall have to say immediately about the comparisons between prices in two recent periods—namely, just before and just after the Great War—I shall try to avoid the cases of great loss in one period and the cases of very great profits in the other. I take the mean, because I want to avoid the rôle of the scandal monger, and because I want the Senate to come to understand the abiding forces in the coal trade with which we, in a legislative sense, will have alone to deal.

I avoid the cases of great and spectacular losses in business, because I believe that this Government can not be led into the paternal undertaking of guaranteeing to incompetent managers of mines a profit when they can not earn it by their own skill.

Attacking the price problem from the other end, I say that this Government can not with safety go further than to put its restraining hand upon extortion. To attempt more would be to undertake to indemnify the buyer of coal against any faulty forecast on his part of market conditions.

I believe—yes; I know—that in the last year extortion was practiced in the coal industry. I believe it is perfectly proper for this Government, which has always striven to safeguard the people against extortion, to draw the line which divides profit and extortion. I believe it is possible to make extortion a criminal offense.

When you come to consider calmly what course we should pursue in connection with coal, I want to ask that you give most careful thought to a few figures which I am about to lay before you. I want you to visualize the tremendous increase in the size of the Nation's coal bill which has come about in seven years' time. I want you to realize that as yet the men of the coal trade have made little progress in shrinking that inflated bill back to normal proportions.

Broadly speaking, there are two kinds of elements in the national coal bill—costs and profits. The profits are an elastic element. Last year we know they were very large, in some instances scandalously large. The coal men tell us that last year was exceptional and that profiteering can never happen again. The other element in prices—the cost of mining and transportation—is not so elastic and the coal men and railroads give us no encouragement that costs are coming down.

As nearly as I can arrive at it, the price which was paid at the point of discharging the railroad car for the 556,500,000 tons of bituminous coal which we produced in 1920 was about two and one-half billions. No one knows what the figure was exactly, but we can approximate it, and the approximation will at least indicate the vastness of the Nation's coal bill. This sum is merely a measure of the money that was paid for the coal itself to the producer and wholesale merchant. At that rate the average price was about $4.50 per net ton.

In addition to the cost of the coal itself, the average freight rate by the end of 1920 was something like $2.50 per net ton. At that rate the transportation bill on 556,500,000 tons would be about $1,400,000,000.

If you total these figures you find that there was paid in America to produce and transport the 1920 coal crop the tidy sum of nearly $4,000,000,000, or within reasonable distance of the total cost of running this Government for one year, with all of its load of war debt. Reducing this figure to the average, also, it will be found that the total wholesale cost of coal at the point of discharging the railroad car was in round numbers $7 per net ton.

These figures are, I admit, astounding; but still you fail to get the perspective unless I carry you back to the last year before the war, and give you the figures as they then stood. In 1914 the amount collected at the mine for the 422,703,970 tons of bituminous coal produced was $493,000,000. On that basis, the average price was $1.17 per net ton. To this the commission of the wholesaler added about 7 cents, making the total to operator and wholesale merchant $1.24 per ton, or $525,000,000 in all.

The amount paid in 1914 for transportating that coal was about $576,000,000, or a rate per ton of $1.41.

The total of the coal and transportation bill in 1914 was, according to these figures, in round numbers, $1,101,000,000. The average cost of the coal at the point of discharging the railroad car was $2.61 per net ton.

I find by these figures that the wholesale coal bill of the people of the United States grew from 1914 to 1920 by about two and a quarter billion dollars per year. All they have received to offset this expense is a matter of 133,000,000 tons of increased output.

It is more imposing to speak of these changes in terms of billions of dollars and hundreds of millions of tons, but I find that if I really want to understand them I have to reduce them down to dollars and cents and to single tons. On that basis they come within easy reach of my own comprehension.

I find that we started in 1914 with a cost of producing coal of something like $1.14 per net ton. It may have been a little less than that in many places, but it was enough more in others to make that a fair average.

I find that after the last advance given the miners in August, 1920, the cost of producing the same coal was easily $3. Since then there has been no material reduction in wages.

That, Senators, means that the increased cost of merely producing a ton of coal, without adding even the interest on the borrowed money, was in the neighborhood of $1.86 per net ton. That is, the increase was 72 per cent per ton greater than the total cost in 1914. The average cost for the whole year 1920 was about $2.87 per net ton. Getting the matter into even more simple form, I find that the out-of-pocket cost of producing a ton of coal at the end of 1920 was perhaps 160 per cent greater than at the end of 1914.

The abiding element in this cost is the increase in pay. As to the exact increase, the testimony is not unanimous; but, in general, I find that in 1914 it ranged between 82 cents and 92 cents per ton, and is now between $2.09 and $2.19 per ton.

Still resorting to the same simple terms, I find that we started in 1914 with an average cost of transporting a ton of coal of $1.41 and ended at the close of 1920 with an average cost of $2.51. This is an increase of 77 per cent. I find further that we have gained nothing by paying out this large sum. Instead, in 1914 we had plenty of transportation.

I believe it about time that this Government should insist that if we are to be liberal in our grants of increases we should get something for them.

These are items which in future we are not going easily to escape. They mean that even if we rob the producer of the interest he must pay on borrowed capital of all his profit, and if we allow not a single penny for the service of distribution, the average cost of coal at the point of discharging the railroad car will be at least $5.51. Making even scanty allowance for the items which I have ignored—interest, profit, and cost of distribution—it is seemingly impossible to escape a future bill for our coal, on the average, of $6 per ton at the point of discharge. Assuming that we shall come to use 550,000,000 tons of bituminous, this will make the national coal bill at the point of discharge from the railroad car the tidy sum of, roughly, $3,300,000,000.

I say to you frankly that I am far more concerned over future economics in this industry and in transportation than I am in digging into the scandalous matter which concerns itself only with the profits which the coal men made in 1920. The latter is a matter which has passed for the time being. Those profits, large and unreasonable as they were, are interesting as a matter of history; but the coal trade assures us that this particular bit of history will not repeat itself. This other matter concerns me vastly more. I am frankly amazed when I realize that, doing our utmost to effect economies and eliminate profits, we can in a year of subnormal business reduce the outturn price of coal to the user by less than $1 below what it was in the year of the most extravagant prices in our history. We have simply loaded this industry with costs to the gunwale, and unless we can jettison some of that disagreeable cargo I am genuinely fearful that we will fare roughly at the hands of the people, as we should.

I have said that in the face of this more serious situation the profits which the operators made in 1920 sink into relative insignificance. Still you may be interested in the results of my calculations on that entertaining subject.

My estimate of the "gross margin" retained by the coal men in 1920 was $918,000,000. This compares with a gross margin of $63,000,000 in 1914. The increase in gross margin was therefore $855,000,000. This means that the average margin per ton was $1.65.

I find, however, that of this gross margin the foreign buyers of some 38,250,000 tons paid $255,000,000. This leaves the American public to carry a burden of margin of perhaps $600,000,000, or about $1.15 per net ton. This profit taking, reduced to the per capita basis, means that the industry took from the people a matter of about $5 per person.

It may, of course, salve your wounded feelings a little if I tell you that the Government may expect to collect from these gentlemen in excess-profits taxes a sum approaching $400,000,000.

Mr. President, I want to speak directly on the bills to-morrow, and I desire to use the charts to indicate the seasonal differentials in coal, the differences in production, and the differences in transportation and distribution. I wish to do that in defense of the bill I have introduced to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to make seasonal freight rates, which I believe will go a long way toward equalizing the distribution of coal, taking the low peak and the high peak of the transportation systems in the winter months, and taking it into the summer months, when the railroads can carry coal for much less than in the winter months, and even up the coal load of the country.

I would like very much to have more Senators listen to these figures and this information, and if I may be permitted at this time to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], I should like to resume on this subject in the morning.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, June 23, 1921, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 22, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. WALSH as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the birth of the morning and the glory of the day are manifestations of Thy holy providence, for which we humbly thank Thee. Give the presence of Thy holy spirit, that our best thoughts and purest desires may be intensified. Grant us the presence of the Lord, that we may walk worthily this day, bearing fruit in every good work. May we know of the sweet peace that follows personal rectitude and the high honor given self-sacrifice. Continue to guide us in all truth, that we may have a correct understanding of all things necessary to make us upright, loyal, patriotic citizens of the country that we love. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk called the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call up House joint resolution No. 7, on the Union Calendar.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to allow me to prefer a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 45 minutes on the subject of limitation of armaments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to address the House for 45 minutes on the subject of limitation of armaments. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, is this satisfactory to the chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am perfectly willing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that by this we are going to clear the way for the tariff bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. We are going to expedite the consideration of the tariff bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER] is recognized for 45 minutes. [Applause.]

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in rising to address this distinguished assembly, which has been characterized as the greatest representative legislative body the world has ever known, I am deeply mindful of the great responsibility that rests upon this Congress as the duly elected Representatives of the American people at what, to my mind, is one of the most critical and most crucial periods in all history.

We have only recently emerged from the most cruel and devastating war of all time, in which all the world has been in a state of flux and turmoil, and civilization, standing on the brink of destruction, surrounded by the hordes of greed and military despotism, has been saved from the cauldron below by the copious shedding of precious American blood, accompanied by the unprecedented and unstinted expenditure of American treasure.

Our material loss has been our spiritual gain, for America has again lived up to her highest traditions and, unbound and unfettered, has fulfilled her highest obligations toward mankind. [Applause.]

We must now devote ourselves toward preserving that which we have saved, for in the hands of the American Nation largely lies the weal or woe of the present as well as future generations of men.

Mars, the unbridled god of war, still stalks unrestrained at large in the world to-day, and our plain duty—a duty which will permit of no subterfuge or evasion—demands that this country, with its traditional high purpose, with prudence and practical idealism, devote itself to the task before us, and, with other nations of the world, meet in conference with a view to circumscribing and limiting by mutual agreement the instruments of destruction, commonly known as armaments.

Mr. Speaker, in discussing a matter of such far-reaching and vital importance as an international conference to limit armaments, I am, indeed, conscious of my inability to do the subject justice, but in the time allotted to me and in my humble way shall touch only upon some of the high points which, to my mind, are particularly applicable to the phase of the subject now under consideration.

It is a well-known fact that the subject is intricate and involved to an unusual degree and the leading humanitarians and statesmen of the age have devoted their best efforts and thought to a proper solution of this great enigma. Among these, I am proud to say, is a distinguished Member of this House, an ex-Member of the Senate of the United States, the Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON, of Ohio. [Applause.]

This venerable American, who is the peer of any Member of either House of Congress in statesmanship and ability, has devoted almost a lifetime to study in the field of international relationship, and it has been the good fortune of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which he is a member, to have the full benefit of his counsel and advice during the discussion and drawing of the Porter resolution, or House joint resolution 143, as it is officially known.

Our able chairman [Mr. PORTER] in drafting this resolution had, I believe, the full approval of the entire committee, at least this is true so far as the majority membership is concerned.

Thinking men of all nations are agreed that the staggering burden of armament is the millstone of destruction which, if not lifted in the very immediate future, will carry down into the depths of despair and ruin the entire human race, and our modern civilization, which a patient and long-suffering humanity has wrought from the hands of time, will rise to strike us and be the very instrument of our annihilation.

I read upon your faces that this is clear to the membership of this House, but it is just as clear that reduction of armament, so far as this Nation is concerned, can not be a unilateral proposition, for, as the President of the United States has said, "merest prudence forbids that we disarm alone."

Let not the world misunderstand our motives; let us in true American fashion be frank with our neighbors and ourselves, thereby rendering the greatest service to humanity.

Let no idle dreams of self-illusionment enter here.

True to our traditions, we Americans recognize that amid the realm of lofty ideals we can not lose sight of the practical and essential if we are to survive and perpetuate our nationality.

As I have said before on the floor of this House, and as I repeat here now, to my mind our most striking national trait, and one that the nations of the world have long since discerned, is that while keeping both "eyes on the stars" we nevertheless recognize the necessity of keeping "both feet on the ground," and thus in the realm of practical accomplishment are great goals achieved and the Nation goes steadfastly forward toward a manifest destiny. [Applause.]

Our distinguished Chief Executive, President Harding, with his keen sense of perception and common touch, with an intimate knowledge of the great American people, to whose desires and wishes he seeks to give expression, has again demonstrated the truth of this statement and very aptly voiced the national mind when, in referring to disarmament, in the historic address which he delivered at the opening of the Sixty-seventh Congress on April 12, 1921, he gave utterance to the following statement:

> The Government is in accord with the wish to eliminate the burdens of heavy armament. * * * We are ready to cooperate with other nations to approximate disarmament, but merest prudence forbids that we disarm alone.

What could better illustrate our proverbial idealism and at the same time be more expressive of our sense of the practical? What more typical of the spirit of Americanism and sound political doctrine? [Applause.]

What could better express the intent of the President to place his administration at its outset in line with an historical American policy and show to the world that he was fully conscious of the responsibility devolving upon the United States in international affairs?

Again, speaking a week later before the statue of the great South American patriot-statesman, Bolivar, in New York, he recalled with pride the progress that had been made toward judicial and arbitral settlement of international differences between the nations of the Americas, and in connection therewith made the following statement:

> It presents an example well worthy of earnest consideration and affords us assurance which will justify our purpose to invite present-day civilization to cast aside the staggering burden of armament.

Thus does the President at the very beginning of his administration, in his vigorous and concise manner of doing things, enunciate his policy and express his determination for action. [Applause.]

It seems to me that our duty is plain and our line of action clearly defined; knowing the constitutional rights and prerogatives vested in Congress, and jealous of any invasion of the same, we are none the less mindful of those of the Executive; we should not do more and can not do less than confine ourselves to the proprieties and demands of the situation and adopt the Porter resolution, wherein the House "expresses its full concurrence" in a declared purpose and intent already expressed by the President.

We should have no pride of opinion in this House, but strive to do only that which will redound to the highest and greatest benefit of our common country, and incidentally to mankind throughout the world.

I have no quarrel with the spirit of the Borah amendment as such, for I believe we are all aiming at the same target, but from a different angle, and therefore with a somewhat different perspective.

As a matter of transcendent international character and of more than domestic importance, I do not believe that it should be attached to the present naval appropriation bill, but I feel that to further the idea, and in the interest of harmony we should, if necessary, waive this objection, but I am convinced that it is not broad enough in its scope, either as to character of armament or of the nations included in the call. It is restrictive in that it attempts, by implication at least, to fix or indicate some of the terms of the agreement to be arrived at.

No authorization or request to the President is necessary or proper in the premises.

His rights are constitutional and inherent to the high office which he occupies, and a questionable invasion should be avoided.

He has already taken the lead in the matter and has declared his policy and intent to act.

Congress should not, even by inference, attempt to suggest or to seize the initiative which has already been supplied by the Executive, moved by deep conviction, as he is, and exercising in the premises an unquestionable prerogative which, under our system of government, is peculiarly and exclusively an Executive function. [Applause.]

I fear the country will not understand nor will it approve of such action on our part.

It is our function to concur and approve, if we deem proper, the action already proposed, and not to authorize and request that which, because of the steps already taken, is at least in process of partial achievement. [Applause.]

Let us face the situation as it is and acknowledge the leadership of our President in the field of international affairs, so long as he does not seek to violate any of the sacred traditions to which we are committed. Congress can sacrifice none of its dignity or prerogatives by adopting a resolution of concurrence and approval as against one of authorization and request.

While I have the greatest respect for the sincerity and patriotism of the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] I can but feel that a resolution calling a conference for the purpose of discussing the reduction of armaments would carry greater weight if not attached to an appropriation bill and particularly not to a naval appropriation bill.

The purpose of such a conference is so unique and its import of such singular interest to all mankind that I feel that it should be disassociated from other legislation and is deserving of enactment by means of a separate bill.

This and more is accomplished by the Porter resolution.

It is unimpeachable in language, clear of purpose and concise in content, and, greatest of all, in full harmony with the best ideals and traditions of the American people.

I wish to beg the indulgence of the House, if I may, for a moment, for the purpose of drawing an historical comparison and to caution against even the remote possibility of an historical parallel.

In the matter of international leadership, respecting this question of armaments, the United States to-day is curiously in the position which the German Empire was shortly after the end of the Franco-Prussian War.

It is quoted that the elder Liebknecht, speaking in the Reichstag in May, 1890, said:

> If the German Empire—and its position in Europe would make the thing easy—resolved to convoke an international congress to search out methods for reducing military charges, it could then be said with reason that Germany marches at the head of civilization.

But this did not happen and, dominated by a strong military party and a war-mad Kaiser, she "goose stepped" over the precipice to her doom, and is now paying just penalty for her treachery to civilization, traceable direct to her neglect of opportunity to serve the highest interests of mankind in days of power, influence, and prosperity.

Thus again doth "paths of glory lead but to the grave," and God forbid that this beloved Nation of ours refuse to recognize the lessons of history.

World conditions are propitious and the time is now ripe, overripe, by international agreement to limit armaments, which are the implements of war, and thus to restrict war. This is no Utopian dream if we will but fulfill our obligations and take steps to call a conference before the existing psychological moment has passed.

The burdened taxpayers cry out against the cost and preparations for war; the mothers and wives that are and are to be lift their hands toward heaven in divine supplication that they may be spared its horrors and sacrifices; the hallowed dead that lie in Flanders field, who gave their all and died to end all war, sleep in silence but to rise and in solemn requiem chant to remind us of our duty to do all in our power to see that a similar holocaust does not again overtake mankind; to these are added the voice of the living, the visible human débris of the conflict, the scarred and maimed veterans in the hospitals throughout the land, bearing as they do physical and mental evidence of the hell of war through which they have passed.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the conditions to which I refer are not in the least overdrawn, I assure you, for if you will pardon the personal reference, I will say that in the dire days of 1917 and 1918 it was my great privilege to humbly serve, as did thousands of other American citizens, on the battle fields of France, and in so doing I believe I have acquired the right to say that I know whereof I speak.

Only recently the President of the United States, in New York, standing uncovered and with bowed head in the presence of the last mortal remains of 5,000 of our heroic dead just returned from the crimson-soaked fields of France said, "It must not happen again," and his words were echoed in millions of hearts from the Atlantic to the Pacific and beyond the seas.

America needs but to turn to her own history to find guaranties of peace full and effective enough to have the most practical bearing on the extent of armaments, and fate—no; I will say a providential destiny—has brought to America the responsibility of being the strongest among the armament competitors left by the World War. [Applause.]

But this great responsibility, like all great responsibilities, carries with it a corresponding obligation of even greater import, because it is predestined to be of the greatest service to mankind.

Conscious of her power, which she will never use except in defense of the right, America looks steadfastly and confidently toward the future; she has never been a slacker either in peace or in war, and she will not now seek to evade her plain duty, having at various times in her history developed substitutes for war in her championship of justice, she can not now do less than call a conference to reduce or limit armaments, thus fulfilling in these latter days Washington's farewell injunction to

"give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence." [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in the remarks which have preceded I have devoted myself to a general discussion of the merits of a resolution or amendment for the limitation of armaments, and I desire now to devote some time to a more thorough and careful analysis of the technical and statistical phase of the subject.

In the broad realm of study presented by this interesting and all-absorbing subject, I do not presume to have more than scratched the surface, but having lived abroad in foreign lands for the period of a decade in my life and having studied and viewed at a close-up range—at an altogether too close-up range at times—the matter of armament, I trust that my humble observations and study of this subject may be of interest to the House.

In proceeding I shall quote quite freely from such eminent authorities in the field of international political and military circles as Gen. Pershing, Gen. Bliss, Brig. Gen. Mitchell, Admiral Sims, and others of equal eminence and distinction.

For the compilation of the accompanying statistics and many of the observations which I shall submit I am indebted to the World Peace Foundation, of Boston, Mass., which has ever been in the vanguard for the limitation of armaments by international agreement.

As a premise for the observations which are to follow, I will again say that among the clearest results of the World War are, first, the decrease in the number of the nations with competing armaments, and, second, the concentration of responsibility for armament of a few of the victorious nations.

The financial ability of the United States to lead in this competition and the present expenditures for its naval program place upon it a tremendous responsibility for the intolerable burden which is thereby being forced upon an exhausted civilization.

In order to obtain the proper perspective of the armament problem it must be viewed internationally and the facts and figures which I shall attempt to present are submitted with the hope that they may shed some definite light upon this all-absorbing subject, which might well be called the "problem of the ages," and while the facts and figures are, to be sure, mostly drawn from national sources, their purpose is to illuminate international conditions, and I wish to make it clear by way of reiteration that they are not presented as arguments for national reduction independent of other nations of the earth nor to in anywise suggest that the problem is of greater importance to the United States than to other countries.

The financial aspect of armament may properly be first considered in connection with the great World War. The total direct cost in the war, not counting interest charges, is officially given at $186,000,000,000 for all belligerents.

The capitalized value of human life destroyed, soldiers and civilians, on a conservative basis, is given in round numbers as $67,000,000,000.

The claims for damages against Germany constituting part of the price she pays for attempting to enslave civilization by the use of her armament, preferred under the treaty of Versailles by the parties thereto as officially reported to the Reparation Commission, but without review, was approximately $47,600,000,000, or about $1,000,000,000 a month for the duration of the war.

Shipping and cargo losses are given at $6,800,000,000; loss of production at $45,000,000,000; war relief and loss to neutrals at $2,750,000,000. It may be said that roughly $855,000,000,000 is the financial handicap that the world has taken on since 1914.

The Danish Research Society, on the social results of the war in Europe, has compiled very interesting data on the loss of life, which is given in the following statistics:

	Decrease in birth rate.	Loss through increase of death rate.	Among those killed in war.	Total loss.
Germany	3,600,000	2,700,000	2,000,000	6,300,000
Austria-Hungary	3,800,000	2,000,000	1,500,000	5,800,000
Great Britain, Ireland	850,000	1,000,000	800,000	1,850,000
France	1,500,000	1,840,000	1,400,000	3,340,000
Belgium	175,000	400,000	115,000	875,000
Italy	1,400,000	880,000	600,000	2,280,000
Bulgaria	155,000	130,000	65,000	275,000
Rumania	150,000	360,000	159,000	510,000
Servia	320,000	1,330,000	690,000	1,650,000
Europe	8,300,000	4,700,000	2,500,000	13,000,000
Russia and Poland	20,250,000	15,130,000	9,820,000	35,580,000

The worst of these percentages is not their size. The worst of it is that these post-war figures would only be cut about 15 per cent if the world were to return to its former habits. The United States, which at this moment is setting the pace in armament competition, used to spend more than 70 per cent of its total annual budget for war purposes, not in a single year only, but on the basis of the running of the Government since 1870. I submit herewith the figures:

Expenditure for armed peace and war.

	1870–1916—Omitting Spanish American and World Wars—47 years.	1870–1919—Including Spanish American and World Wars—50 years.
Army	$3,956,346,000	$19,334,031,000
Navy	2,594,530,000	6,229,612,000
Interest	2,455,865,000	3,204,001,000
Pensions	4,906,803,000	5,469,874,000
	13,913,544,000=71.5%	34,327,578,000=76.4%
All other purposes	5,543,727,000=28.5%	10,672,145,000=23.6%
Total	19,457,271,000=100.0%	44,937,065,000=100.0%

The burden of this debt brings it about that every belligerent has such staggering taxes as to hamper all the processes of national and individual life.

I call to your observation that for the first time in history a nation, dismembered Austria, has practically gone into the hands of a receiver. More than 11 out of 12 of the European States, even with tremendous taxation, are spending far beyond their incomes, and three out of four countries in the world are unable to raise the taxes to meet their running expenses. The United States, widely heralded as the richest nation in the world, this year shows an estimated Treasury deficit of about $2,005,037,000, and in 1922, with all of her economies, it is estimated that the minimum deficit which can be shown is $1,448,581,000, taking into account as a part of expenditures refunding operations of the fiscal periods. The situation in Europe is so bad that any nation which can even approach normal conditions of solvency regards the same as a triumphal achievement.

Italy, for instance, after herculean effort in paring down national expenses proudly announces that this year's deficit has been cut from 14,000,000,000 to 10,000,000,000 lire, and the cabinet gets a vote of confidence for what is regarded as a wonderful accomplishment.

Contrary to the idea which is all too prevalent, the United States is little better off than Europe.

The year after the war Congress appropriated 92 per cent of the total amount of money for the year ending June 30, 1920, for purposes of war, past, present, and future, leaving the munificent (?) remaining 8 per cent for the rest of the Government.

By a certain amount of luck and the national demand for economy the expenditures fell below the appropriation, and the percentage of disbursement for that year was 86.4 per cent for war purposes and 13.6 per cent for the normal activities of civilization. The strange, but true, had happened. The Army and Navy had acquired billion-dollar habits, and the percentages since then stand as follows:

Current financial condition of the United States.

[By the United States Bureau of Efficiency.]

	1921 appropriations.	1922 estimates.
Past wars	$2,838,118,400=67.9%	$1,794,575,915=44.10%
National defense (Army and Navy)	855,956,962=20.5%	1,548,025,312=38.05%
Total, past wars and present defense	3,694,075,362=88.4%	3,343,601,227=82.15%
General purposes (except Post Office)	481,744,726=11.6%	725,848,630=17.85%
Total for all purposes (except Post Office)	4,175,820,088=100.0%	4,068,449,857=100.0%

It is a notable fact that after every war expenditures for naval and military purposes have tended to rise. The reason is not far to seek. The "experts" who before the war explained that their current weapons were absolutely necessary on emerging from the war discovered that much of the armament they went in with was a broken reed. The guns did not shoot far enough, ships were not big enough, and expenses took another jump. It is not necessary for a nation to be a participant in a war for this to be true.

The effect is the same upon the nation which is only an onlooker, and so after each conflict the danger of "bleeding to death in time of peace" is increased.

The World War is no exception to the rule, as witness these figures:

Growth of armaments after war.

Country.	Army.		Navy.
	1912	1921	1912	1921
Belgium	$13,119,000	$107,823,000	(1)	(1)
France	177,656,000	1,148,331,000	$81,693,000	$167,799,000
United Kingdom	134,850,000	710,713,000	218,194,000	410,605,000
Italy	83,284,000	80,815,000	41,859,000	45,712,000
Japan	47,066,000	106,285,000	46,510,000	176,072,000
United States	107,787,000	771,830,000	138,390,000	651,222,000

[1] No navy.

Only recently a Member of Congress figured out the cost of our Army per capita, based on the Army appropriation bills for the last 12 years. These comparative figures are submitted herewith:

Cost of Army per capita.

Year.	Officers and enlisted men.	Army appropriations.	Per capita cost.
1909	84,133	$94,371,000	$1,121
1910	84,500	100,459,000	1,189
1911	81,363	96,341,000	1,171
1912	87,094	92,587,000	1,063
1913	91,384	90,907,003	994
1914	94,890	94,241,000	993
1915	103,403	101,019,000	976
1916	105,129	101,959,000	969
1917	141,420	267,801,000	1,893
1918	1,358,713	5,248,708,000	3,863
1919	2,516,719	12,271,868,000	4,876
1920	294,015	772,324,000	2,630
1921	187,946	392,558,000	2,088

It is perhaps neither new nor consoling to learn that armies have been constantly increasing in size, and the progress toward the military system of universal draft in case of hostilities is most interesting and enlightening.

The Napoleonic, Crimean, and Franco-Prussian wars of 1800, 1854, and 1870, respectively, present figures worthy of consideration and attention.

The year 1921 marked the period in which both Germany and Austria ceased to be what they had long been—the European pivot of the armament race. The following table shows the growth attending the Army in the United States and leading European nations at the different high points between 1800 and 1921:

Growth of standing armies.

	1800	1854	1870	1880	1900	1906	1921
Great Britain	169,428	417,046	302,405	307,494	513,863	445,731	425,000
France	160,230	260,000	393,500	609,983	672,565	677,581	735,000

I regret that I am unable to furnish figures for the Japanese Army during the corresponding period, but we may rest assured that this enterprising nation of the Rising Sun, quick to imitate in recent years, and more often disposed to lead than to follow, does not prove an exception to the rule.

The world has just been through a great war, a World War, widely and officially called "impossible" before it happened.

The next war will start in where this one left off, plus the advantage of military experience in the interval. To depict the next conflict if, or when, it comes, is a fascinating temptation to a vivid imagination. To him who yields to that temptation only one thing is certain—he will fall short of the mark.

To summarize, this past war is a sufficient forecast of these conflicts of the "absolute type," to use the phrase of Clausewitz, the standard schoolmaster of military theory. Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, who was our member of the supreme military council during the operations of the allied armies and who later became a member of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, summarized the situation as follows:

First. It is a world war, such as we have just passed through, which is necessarily one involving the great civilized powers, that constitutes a menace to our existing civilization.

Second. Such a war depends upon a few so-called powers.

Third. A war between any two of them, which formerly created relatively only a ripple on the surface of the great deep, now has an irresistible tendency to draw them all into the roaring maelstrom.

Fourth. To meet this, these few nations must stagger under an increasing burden during the years of armed peace, solely to train what, if we can find some other method satisfactory for our purpose, is an unnecessary number of men in purely destructive arts; and to accumulate enormous quantities of costly material which does not add a penny to our permanent wealth, and which when used for the only purpose for which it can be used is finally represented by an atmosphere of stinking gas and by the destruction of every form of real and otherwise permanent wealth.

Fifth. Such wars resulting in the application of every ounce of accumulated energy on both sides, must result in the practical destruction of one by the other, even if both are not ruined.

Sixth. Such wars, necessarily characterized by an intensity of national passions heretofore unknown, come to be regarded by each side as wars for life or death, in which each, to save his life and destroy his adversary, will use every agency of destruction available to him; and therefore such agencies as the absolute blockade to starve people who heretofore were regarded as noncombatants, noxious and toxic gases, night and day bombing of cities from airplanes, the submarine, have come to stay until replaced by more destructive agencies.

Seventh. Various causes will operate to draw neutrals into the struggle.

Eighth. When war comes it will be without warning, and everyone must be ready.

Ninth. All of this is due to the acceptance by a few Governments of the military doctrine of a nation in arms; to their belief that no way can be found to guarantee their rights except universal preparedness, no guaranty against a general war except a general preparation for it.

And, lastly, with all that staring us in the face, the fact that after the last ounce of strength has been accumulated and the last combination of powers has been made, one side or the other must strike or forfeit every dollar and every hope bound up in its preparation.

In such a war there will be no "first 100,000." Gen. Pershing furnishes this testimony as to numbers:

It is evident that a force of about 1,000,000 is the smallest unit which in modern war will be a complete, well-balanced, and independent fighting organization.

War is not only colossal in scale and scope henceforth, but it is three dimensional, whether we view it as military or naval or take the point of view of the civilian. On land, war is already conducted on, above, and under the ground; at sea, it is on, above, and under the water. Back home the sons go to the front, civilians turn their industries over to war purposes, and everybody bends every effort to fight the enemy with literally all weapons from dollars to bread crumbs. The noncombatant has been abolished, and war projects itself in time of peace into every nook and cranny of the industrial world in preparation for the next outbreak of hostilities.

The next war will not confine itself to trenches in devastated France. Its impact will not only be upon those within range of the guns, even though the range has risen to scores of miles. For every man on the firing line there are four at home furnishing equipment of all kinds to him. But even if that were not true, the distinction between combatant and noncombatant is not as valid as it used to be. The mobility of warlike operations has so increased that military objectives have completely changed. Aircraft traveling under ordinary conditions 100 miles an hour on tracks of their own choice are responsible for the expansion of warfare to include potentially every human being in the countries at war.

Quoting from the testimony of Brig. Gen. William Mitchell, in a recent hearing before the House Committee on Naval Affairs, he said:

Gas bombs were not used in Europe because if one side had started it the other side would have started it and the loss of life among women and children in the back areas would have been terrific. However, that is contemplated as a possible use of the airplane in the future, and we find * * * that we can use certain amounts of certain gases for covering areas where the gas will continue to be effective for a period of time. If we wanted to cover an area of 10 miles, such as New York—New York is a very easy target—we may use about 2 tons of crying gas once in every eight days. If we wanted to use mustard gas, we would use about 70 tons once in every eight days. If we wanted to use phosgene gas, 200 tons. This, of course, is very deadly.

And this is the latest, the quotation being from D. B. Bradner, Chief of the Chemical Research and Development Division, United States Chemical Warfare Service:

The Chemical Warfare Service has discovered a liquid approximately three drops of which, when applied to any part of the skin, will cause a man's death. * * * One plane carrying 2 tons of the liquid could cover an area 100 feet wide by 7 miles long in one trip and could deposit material to kill every man in the area by action on his skin. Where men were not protected by gas masks, which would be the case if attack were made on a city, the fatal area would be several times as great. * * * The only limit to the quantity of this liquid which could be made is the amount of available electric power, as nearly every nation has practically an unlimited supply of the necessary raw materials. It would be entirely possible for this country to manufacture several thousand tons each day provided the necessary plants had been built. * * * During the Argonne offensive in the past war the entire First American Army, of one and a quarter million men, occupied an area of 40 kilometers long by 20 kilometers wide. If Germany had had 4,000 tons of this material and 300 or 400 planes equipped for its distribution, the entire First Army would have been annihilated in 10 to 12 hours. * * *

During the past war gas produced over 30 per cent of our casualties. In the future the percentage will be far higher. New methods of defense will be devised to meet this particular new development.

The gas referred to, commonly known during the war as the "mystery gas," was invented by Prof. W. Lee Lewis, head of the chemistry department of Northwestern University, in a series of experiments, costing about $250,000, conducted during the war by direction of the President. Speaking at West Point on April 20 last, Prof. Lewis is reported as saying:

We face the possibility in naval warfare of the future of armor-piercing, toxic, and tear shells; smoke screens, toxic smoke screens, and invisible toxic fumes. We may also consider in this connection parallel defensive measures, such as gas mask for a whole battleship. Gas weapons are capable of a much finer adaptation to purpose than explosive weapons, and the future will see worked out a degree of scientific refinement in the development of gas weapons for all types of military operations. Future battles will not be to the strong but to the superior in intelligence. Warfare will become less a matter of brute strength and relative man power and more and more a matter of scientific acumen.

Gen. Pershing, commander in chief of our armies, who considers such probabilities, has the following to say:

It would appear that recent experience should be enough to convince everybody of the danger of renewal of this competition. But one nation can not reduce armament unless all do. It is time that enlightened people everywhere should undertake to reach some rational agreement which would not only relieve the world of its heavy financial burden but which in itself would go far toward the prevention of war.

We are not a warlike people. We do not wish to expand at the expense of any other nation, and we have no designs on anybody. If other people feel the same toward us and toward each other, it seems unreasonable that they will be unwilling to consent in principle to some limitation of armament to be carried out when certain nations succeed in establishing stable governments and are willing to recognize the wisdom of such a course. Otherwise, may we not seriously ask ourselves whether civilization is a failure and whether we are to regard war as a normal and inevitable scourge that mankind must suffer?

"In some future years," said Sir Edward Grey, in accepting the American invitation in 1911 to negotiate an unlimited arbitration treaty, "great nations of the world may discover, as individuals have discovered, that law is a better remedy than force, and that in all the time they have been in bondage to this tremendous expenditure the prison door has been locked on the inside."

That is the exact truth, and conditions have brought it about that America is found to have the key. Let us sketch the sequence of events. The World War, no reader needs to be reminded, was widely and quite properly heralded as a crusade against militarism, as a war of peace. Statesmen, with civilization hanging in the balance, called upon their peoples to hold fast to the end that this agony would not again come upon the world—and the people believed them, you and I among them. Unquestionably the allied leaders on land and sea also believed this to be true. Witness Admiral Sims, who was head of the United States naval forces in Europe and was in continual conference with all the naval chiefs of staff and who, speaking of reducing armaments as an aftermath of the war, says:

These things were continually discussed and one of the commonest remarks was that when we should get done with this war we will all be pretty faulty if we can not find some means by which we can get along peaceably in the world, and save the world the enormous expenditures of a country like France, which needed a great army to protect itself from invasion from the east, and countries like Great Britain, needing protection on the sea.

That the idea did not die when the armistice halted the warriors when the zero hour of a hoped-for peace was struck is evidenced by the testimony of Gen. Bliss from the inside of the peace conference:

In the conduct of the peace conference the military committee, representing all the nations concerned, and particularly the five great powers, was charged with the work of drawing up the military, naval, and air terms to be imposed upon Germany and the other Central Powers. It was originally intended to embody these terms in a preliminary treaty. The committee in a short time agreed upon these terms and submitted them to the conference. After a great deal of delay they were finally approved, but the delay, although there was some difference of opinion as to the character of one of the terms, was mainly caused by the intervention of other matters. The peace terms, as drawn up by the military committee, prescribed what it was proposed to impose upon Germany for the purpose of destroying the military machine which she had built up and completely destroying the military system which alone enabled the machine to exist and operate. When the peace conference accepted these terms it agreed upon the introduction of a preamble to them, the exact words of which, as I now recall them, are as follows:

"In order to render possible the initiation of a general limitation of armaments for all nations, Germany undertakes strictly to observe the military, naval, and air clauses which follow."

The preamble was signed without hesitation by the representatives of 34 nations, including those of the existing five great powers, and in addition to those of the Central Powers.

The soldier-statesman might have gone further. He might have said that therein the victors had given the first real gauge of battle to the god of war; that in cutting down the arms of the vanquished they had one and all pledged themselves to do likewise. Without attempting to turn back the water which has now forever gone over the mill, many plain Americans find themselves asking, What would have happened if the President of the United States had only bent sufficiently from his program of determined action to have permitted the "associated power" to participate to the extent of its judgment in the peace? No one can say with certainty what the outcome would have been, but many believe that we would have been much further advanced in the solution of the problem which we are now endeavoring to meet.

As the association of nations that won the war thus lost its strongest partner, the condition of Europe has gone from bad to worse, and throughout the world, once the peace was signed, no man knew in the morning what the day's Gethsemane would be.

First of all, respecting armaments, the United States followed logically the stand of aloofness which by a series of complications she had been forced to take. The rest of the effective world was bound by certain understandings, pledged to talk before they fought, pledged to aid each other under certain conditions, and pledged to substitute law for force; but we find the anomalous situation of countries who were in a technical state of peace continuing in a more or less actual state of war, and our own country in a technical state of war but in an actual condition of peace. To be sure, the United States had, in fact, blazed the trail, but all the other victors by a peculiar "circumstance of history" had forged ahead of her by signing a single document at one and the same time.

The American people are peculiarly constituted, but above all are disciples of the god of things as they are and not as some might have wished them to have been or as they may have been. Whatever the merits or demerits of the case may have been, whether we were kept out by internal dissension or pride of opinion in high places, matters not now. The United States, the giant of the Western Hemisphere, a Nation surrounded by wide oceans and friendly or impotent neighbors, proceeded with an extensive naval program of several years' standing because the opinion of the General Board of the Navy prevailed in our legislative bodies. Without criticizing the sincerity of the words, I find the following in a recent report of the Secretary of the Navy, quoting from a memorandum of the General Board of the Navy:

Our present Navy is not sufficient to give due weight to the diplomatic remonstrances of the United States in peace nor to enforce its policy in war.

Putting it that way immediately shocks the patriotic American, who knows full well the honorable and generous history of his country, but in the matter of armament rivalry, involving the life or death of nations, it is not the domestic opinion, though true, that counts, but the international effect of the country's action. As an inheritance of past warfare and strife, linked with diplomatic duplicity, we find that international suspicion is deeply ingrained in the historical sense of nations, and the procedure of the United States, most unfortunately, has been viewed in that light. It would appear that the facts and experiences of history are cumulative, and that the mistakes of nations, like those of individuals, rise to hamper and restrict progress, peace, and good will in the world. Fear in nations, like fear among people, is the bugaboo of mankind. However unreal such fear may be, it exists, not only against us but with us against others. Being more or less intangible, it is one of the most difficult things to dissipate. There is only one way to do it. Take all national fears into the open and let the sunlight of reason and publicity dissipate them so that there remain only the legitimate requirements of defense, all the better for being understood instead of being misunderstood. One way to do this is to call a conference—a conference of sunlight on international relations. The keen mind of Gen. Bliss analyzed the result of such a meeting from the point of view of the United States in the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, pages 595 and 596. I quote him as follows:

I know that you gentlemen are thinking of the interests of the people of the United States. You are asked to appropriate large sums for preparedness. When representatives of our military agencies come here to tell you what they need the money for, they do not tell you that they desire to build up our military system for any vague purpose, but that it is necessary to do so in order to protect our own Nation. They tell you that they fear something, and if you ask them what it is, they will tell you exactly what it is they fear. If they do, they will tell you everything that has been told every Government for 50 years. For 50 years they have been explaining their bills needed to get the money necessary to prepare, not as many say for aggression, but for defense. And so you, like other Governments, have been told what it is that we fear and whom we are afraid of, but neither you nor they have been told what the people really fear, and I do not think that either you or they will ever know until there is a conference, such as has never been held, in respect to which the peoples of all nations will know day by day exactly what the representatives propose to do and why they propose to do it. The result of such a conference will enable us, for the first time, to actually know what nation or nations, if any, we must prepare ourselves against. In such a conference we should make a reasonable proposition tending to remove national fear. We would know that any nation which declined to accept it is likely to be, as far as we are concerned, the next Germany, whose aggression we must be prepared to resist. We can then go to the people of the United States with a clear conscience and demand their billions for defense against such a nation.

But some ask, should we really take the lead in calling such a conference? My answer is this: If you agree with me that we occupy the key position in the world respecting reduction of armaments, how can we fail to act and live up to our full responsibility toward ourselves and toward mankind? The answer, to my mind, is clear. The conference must and will be called. The people of the country desire it, Congress has been pushing the matter, and the President himself has spoken. It is a part of a definite policy dating back to the very inception of the Naval appropriation bill of 1916 authorizing the naval building program now under way. I quote from that document:

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to adjust and settle its international disputes by mediation or arbitration, to the end that war may be honorably avoided. It looks with apprehension and disfavor upon the general increase of armament throughout the world, but it realizes that no single nation can disarm, and that without a common agreement upon the subject every considerable power must maintain a relative standing in military strength. In view of the premises, the President is authorized and requested to invite at an appropriate time, not later than the close of the war in Europe, all of the Governments of the world to send representatives to a conference which should be charged with the duty of formulating the plans for a court of arbitration or other tribunal to which disputes common between nations should be referred for adjudication and peaceful settlement, and to consider the question of disarmament, and submit their recommendations to their respective Governments for approval. The President is hereby authorized to appoint nine citizens of the United States, who in his judgment shall be qualified for the mission by eminence in law and by devotion to the cause of peace, to be representatives of the United States in such a conference. The President shall fix the compensation of such representatives and such secretaries and other employees as may be needed. Two hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and set aside and placed at the disposal of the President to carry into effect the provisions of this paragraph.

If at any time before the construction authorized by this act shall have been contracted there shall have been established, with the cooperation of the United States of America, an international tribunal or tribunals competent to secure peaceful determination of all international disputes, and which shall render unnecessary the maintenance of competitive armaments, then and in that case such naval expenditures as may be inconsistent with the engagements made in the establishment of such tribunal or tribunals may be suspended, when so ordered by the President of the United States.

This is an ample precedent, but it is not the first similar declaration of policy. As far back as June 25, 1910, a resolution of similar import was adopted and stands of record in a joint resolution which I do not deem it necessary to quote.

The United States has had an historical policy in forwarding international disarmament, and Congress has always given to the Executive sympathetic assistance in all such moves when they fell within America's range of international relations. So it is that while the policy is an historical one, the unfortunate position of certain European powers which have now disappeared from the field of dominant European politics did not permit of an appropriate presentation. The intervention of a European war, of course, further limited our opportunity to act, but now the responsibility is fairly upon us and the Government has shown a realization of its duty. For the initiation of this new development we are greatly indebted to Senator BORAH, of Idaho. By a vote of 58 to 0 the Senate on March 1, 1921, passed an amendment to the bill, which eventually failed, to make appropriations for the naval service, in these words:

The President is authorized and requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to invite the Governments of Great Britain and Japan to send representatives to a conference which shall be charged with the duty of entering into an understanding or agreement by which the naval building program of each of said Governments, to wit, the United States, Great Britain, and Japan, shall be substantially reduced annually during the next five years to such an extent and upon such terms as may be agreed upon, which conclusion is to be reported to their respective Governments for their approval.

The same text was again introduced in the Senate on May 4 by Senator BORAH, and we now find the Senator, whose activities and sincerity I must heartily commend but with whom I do not agree as to detail, offering substantially the same resolution as a Senate amendment to the present naval bill.

The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, Mr. PORTER, who is none the less persistent and vigilant in furthering this great idea, on June 6 introduced the following joint resolution, with which, I am frank to say, I am in complete accord, and which, I trust, will be adopted, either as a separate resolution or as a substitute on the present naval bill in lieu of that presented by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. This is merely a matter of personal opinion, however, and I shall loyally support whichever of these resolutions Congress may, in its wisdom, decide to adopt.

The Porter resolution is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Congress hereby expresses its full concurrence in the declaration of the President in his address to Congress on April 12, 1921, that "We are ready to cooperate with other nations to approximate disarmament, but merest prudence forbids that we disarm alone," and, further, fully concurs in his declared purpose and intention to call an international conference to consider the limitation of armaments, with a view to lessen materially the burden of expenditures and the menace of war, and that for the expenses preliminary to and in connection with the holding of such conference the sum of $100,000, to be expended under the direction of the President, is hereby appropriated.

There is a school of opinion which maintains that in the pressing matter of reducing armaments the problem is one for statesmen and not for legislators to settle. To a certain degree I am in accord with this idea, but not entirely so. Legislators reflect the opinion of the people, and should be encouraged to do so. Perhaps it is not their duty, solely and alone, to appraise the international political elements which must be considered in deciding when and in what way to initiate the necessary conference. It will be noted that the Porter resolution does not assume to initiate, but simply seeks to concur and indorse, and in this respect I feel that it is a more appropriate form to adopt than that which comes to us from the other end of the Capitol.

It is not too much to presume that the very best statesmen will be selected for the task of representing the United States in the conference. Military and naval officers undoubtedly will be included as technical experts, but should not predominate. It has been said that the military and naval profession is comprised of men "whose sole business is to think in terms of war." Their domination in a conference such as is proposed might serve to stimulate the international fears to which I have referred and work to a minimum reduction of armament and in a sense nullify the opportunity for constructive solution of the problem before us. I have the highest regard for the patriotism and ability of the military and naval authorities of this Nation, who have so well and faithfully served our common country, but their business is to employ force when called upon to do so and to have their force ready for action in a case of need. Their point of view is fundamentally and properly different from that of the statesman and the civilian.

In the high theory of military and naval circles, the war game as a form of strategical exercise is a normal and inevitable thing. For the purpose of working out a problem an assumption is made that the United States is at war with France or some other foreign country. The officers of the Navy War College, for example, intensively study the naval situation of the two countries, with respect to possibilities of attack and defense, work out a tactical campaign with model warships under the command of officers. There develops in the course of such exercises certain advantages of a French type of vessel, which exists in no other navy, over an American one. The result of that in the next Congress may well be an insistent demand that that certain change be made in construction, all of which is quite valid from the technical point of view, but is invalid from the political point of view because it does not take into consideration the practical impossibility of war between the two countries involved. I simply cite this illustration to bring out the point in question.

It is obvious that policy must take some account of the military conditions. In the United States the Executive is superior to the military or civil power. The Constitution, as you well know, provides "That the President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy." It being equally obvious that military requirements are dependent upon policy and that in the State Department lies the duty of determining the dangerous elements in policy, it seems that there should be closer coordination between the conduct of the Nation's foreign affairs and the military and naval branches of the Government. But aside from whatever discussion takes place in Cabinet meetings, nothing of the sort seems to occur. In fact, before the war, there were highly organized and exceedingly efficient Divisions of Military and Naval Intelligence, but nothing similar in the State Department. There now exists in the latter a Division of Political Intelligence, the principal business of which is to coordinate the various elements of foreign policy for the use of those who conduct the daily work of the department. From the point of view of armaments this still leaves something to be desired. The President, the Secretaries of State, War, and Navy, and possibly the chairmen of the corresponding committees of the two Houses of Congress might, with great profit to the Nation, be constituted a national defense committee.

Our great trouble in this matter in the minds of many is that the branches of the military have not been in practice properly coordinated in their relations to other branches of the Government. The State Department should be consulted about the size of the Navy and also of the Army. Aside from the President and Congress, no other persons should be permitted to intrude. These, on the other hand, however, should not have any opinion as to whether the Navy should be made of battleships or submarines, or any other technical type, but should rely upon the Navy Department for proper determination of these professional subjects.

As far as the United States is concerned, the chief problem in the reduction of armaments is naval. The oceans increase mutual fears. It is usually possible to be friendly with a neighbor nation and there is a natural democratic deterrent to building up a great army from among a peaceful folk because of the sheer number of men required, but a navy needs comparatively few men, and it is easy to fear nations far away.

Navies are more closely allied in the public mind with foreign wars than armies. Differences between nations that are contiguous with a few notable exceptions are comparatively few. They will not raise the question of employing armies. All other differences have had the Navy in the background as a final resort, and there is a notable tendency on the part of the naval men to bank on that circumstance.

This explains the statement of the American General Board of the Navy when its experts inform us "our present Navy is not sufficient to give due weight to the diplomatic remonstrances of the United States in peace," or other words to that effect.

There was a time when that attitude was unquestioned and when the number of naval powers was great enough to justify it in some degree.

But the situation is changed. The World War has given the naval rivalry an entirely new aspect. Just before it some figures were carefully compiled with the object of showing the monetary investment of the world in navies.

It was found that the eight powers had combined fleets with a conservatively estimated worth of around $4,000,000,000, while the other powers having fleets of any size could value them only at about four hundred million, or substantially one-tenth. Obviously any possible rivalry was then confined to the leading eight, but after the World War there emerged but five powers with major fleets, and their naval armaments is rather relatively larger than before the war in comparison with the minor fleets. In fact, on the basis of tonnage, the British Empire in 1914 had the only fleet as big as the total minor navies, while to-day four out of the five majors have navies which outrank all the minors together.

Not only is the discrepancy between the minors and majors increased but the differences among the majors have become notably larger.

The war, generally speaking, effected great reductions in tonnage by rendering ships obsolete, so that only Great Britain and the United States show increase in 1914 and 1921.

What the war did to fleets was to send practically everything of any age to the junk pile, or to the intermediate purgatory of being out of commission. The British naval list of March, 1914, gives 76 battleships. The United States naval intelligence now credits her Navy with 26, while the British return to Parliament of March, 1921, accounts for only 22.

Current statistics are discrepant, showing the doubt in the minds of even experts.

The British return to Parliament referred to arranges ships according as they do or do not embody war lessons.

Rear Admiral Long, director of naval intelligence, writes that—

It is not possible to state definitely what vessels embody the lessons learned at Jutland, but the office can furnish you with what is believed to be the correct numbers of total ships in the various classes.

This statement follows:

In connection with the fleets as a whole, one of the most frequent arguments used is the necessity of defending the coast lines. At first glance it seems clear that the relation between sea exposure and sea power is fundamental, but on closer examination no such conclusion follows.

The character of the coast, the number, size, contour of the harbor, for instance, may throw the fantastic theory away.

For example, on our Atlantic seaboard there are several good harbors to one on the Pacific, therefore it follows that from a strategical point of view a larger number of ships would be required to defend our Pacific coast than to defend the Atlantic coast, although the Atlantic coast exceeds considerably in miles of length the Pacific coast.

The British Atlantic coast includes not only the British Isles but South Africa and the West Indies.

The Dutch colonial coast is twenty-four times the length of Holland itself, and thousands of miles away from the homeland.

So it would seem that no general conclusions could be drawn from such figures, but, as a matter of interest to the House, they are presented herewith for what they are worth:

The cost of the Navy is constantly rising and types of vessels constantly multiplying. The latest figures for naval materials is given in the House and Senate hearings for January and February last, as follows:

Cost of naval vessels.

Battleship, with ammunition	$43,145,000
Battleship, without ammunition	38,500,000
Airplane carrier, 35,000 tons	28,000,000
Airplane carrier, 25,000 tons	21,600,000
Cruiser, 10,000 tons	9,900,000
Submarine chaser	5,900,000
Fleet submarine	4,000,000
Transport	4,000,000
Mine-laying submarine	2,500,000
Destroyer	2,000,000
Gunboat	1,100,000

Cost of aircraft.

HEAVIER THAN AIR.

Ships' spotting planes	$41,000
Ships' fighting planes	38,910
Tordepo planes	87,400
Reconnaissance planes	34,540
Pursuit planes	34,980
Practice planes	40,090

LIGHTER THAN AIR.

Nonrigid airship	160,000
Small touring airship	60,000
Kite balloons	15,000
Free balloons	5,000

Another phase of naval cost is deterioration. Vessels are retired after a period of service which is constantly decreasing in length. A battleship can not be expected to hold its place these days for more than 10 years, but may not be written off completely for a much longer time. Some of our obsolete battleships are even now doing service in the Greek Navy, and the German battleships, by the treaty of Versailles, may not be replaced for 20 years.

In time of peace "obsolete" is the epitaph erected to a naval vessel that has passed into the discard. The very special character of naval craft is illustrated by the fact that they are worth practically nothing except for their designed purpose—the Eagle boat for instance.

The following table, drawn from British sources (American figures not being readily available), shows that 10 years ago the junk value was negligible:

Sir Percy Scott, who has been referred to as the greatest naval brain in Europe, writing in the London Times of March 15 last said:

I have asked the question, "What is the use of a battleship?" and have received one direct reply. A midshipman has told me, "It is no damned use at all." I sincerely hope that some member of the house will elicit where we shall store away our battleships in the event of our going to war? Shall we construct a safe harbor for them in Iceland?

Admiral Scott has repeated this in one of those famous discussions of public affairs conducted by the London Times, extending from November to February. In an early letter he put the English case against the battleship:

You must admit that in the war we were nearly forced to submission by starvation. You must admit that the German battleship played no part in reducing us to starvation. You must admit that if our battleships' superiority had been double what it was it could not have protected us from starvation. You must admit that the dominant arm of the war was the submarine. Strange as it may appear, I believe that this blunder (of building the wrong weapon to combat the submarine) won the war for us. Looking over some German correspondence in 1914 which has reference to my letter in your paper proclaiming that the battleship is dead, I believe that the Germans with astute minds thought that I was insincere, so they went on with their program and did not build submarines.

Flag officer reminds us of the fact that before the advent of the submarine the battleship did not feel very comfortable by night, owing to the possibility of attack by torpedo, but when the submarine came on the scene she did not feel comfortable either by night or day.

The new weapons have naturally revolutionized warfare, and up to the present they have favored defense much more than offense. They gave power to a weak country and have taken it away from the strong.

The rulers of our navy must call in a doctor and cure them of that complaint, "pig-headedness."

The submarine has adopted the tactics of all birds and animals. The brain of these creatures tells them, I suppose, that the greatest secret against attack is not to be seen. I am inclined to think that it is not a bad idea. By experience I have found that the animal very often imposes his will of not wishing to be dead on the sportsman who wishes him to be dead. How clever the animals are! I wish that they could speak, for they might be able to tell me what the use of a battleship is.

And all of this, my friends and colleagues, from such a high authority as Admiral Sir Percy Scott, of the British Navy.

But we find ourselves amid confusion by confusion confounded when the British first lord of the Admiralty, in a statement explanatory of the naval estimates of 1920–21, says that—

In our opinion, the capital ship remains the unit on which sea power is built up.

What are we poor mortals who are inexperienced to believe, anyway?

But it is significantly added, after discussion of the value of airplanes and submarines and of counter measures against them, "that it is even possible that the present battleships will change to one of submersible type and even of a flying type." In other words, when is a battleship not a battleship? Will some one please answer?

In other words, that the battleship, the capital ship of the future, may not be a battleship at all, but a submarine or an airplane, or possibly a "who knows what."

Having defined the battleship in theory, the Admiralty suavely turn to the building of real airplane carriers.

Then along comes the American General Board of the Navy, citing the British Admiralty in its annual report on September 24, 1920, with complete approval and added battleship credentials of its own.

On February 2, 1921, the General Board, on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs, again reached the same conclusion, in a report which was based on the historical (?) fact that—

The general principle of concentration of power in ships that can take and keep the sea at all times and in all weathers, that can deliver and receive the heaviest blows, and that can overcome the strongest ships that may be brought against them will continue as long as navies exist.

The report assumed by oblique criticism of their craft that these qualities were permanently inherent in the present type of battleship. It estimated that during the war "it was upon the potential power of these ships that the activities of all other naval craft was based," and then explained that it was "sea power vested and latent" in battleships situated at Scapa Flow and other bases which destroyed "by inaction" the offensive power of the German fleet.

The report repeated the 1920 quotation from the British Admiralty, but for some strange reason, strange at least to me, it did not mention the current British policy respecting capital ships which had been stated by the chancellor of the exchequer in Parliament two months before, in December, 1920.

White determined to maintain the Navy at a standard of strength which shall adequately secure the safety of the Empire and its maritime communications, the cabinet before sanctioning a program of reconstruction are bound to satisfy themselves that the lessons of the war have been definitely ascertained, more particularly as regards the place and usefulness of the capital ship in future naval operations. They, however, therein decided, and I am glad to say the Admiralty recommends the desire, that the committee of imperial defense should institute at once an extensive investigation into the whole question of naval strength as affected by the latest developments of naval warfare. They will present no program for capital-ship construction to Parliament until the results of this inquiry have been considered.

The United States and Japan are therefore the only present builders of battleships. It is proper in the course of this discussion, without going into the technicalities as to sea power, to set forth some of the salient facts respecting the use of battleships when there is a war to fight.

Our own rear admiral, Henry T. Mayo, in a paper describing the work of the Navy during the war, states when the various elements of the Navy were pressed into service, and gives dates which, arranged chronologically, show that the battleship was next to the last type of ship to go into the fight:

March, 1917, merchant ships armed. Gun crews assigned from the Navy.
April, 1917, destroyers sent to Europe.
June, 1917, cruiser convoys established.
September, 1917, decided to send battleships to Europe.
November, 1917, 14-inch naval guns assigned to land forces.
April, 1918, mine layers began work.

It is admitted that the battleship was not able to participate actively in combating the U-boat. The Germans during the war had in commission 399 submarines at different times, but they never had as many as 200 in commission at any one time.

A total of 207 submarines, worth at the outside $500,000,000, were sunk. Only 10,000 men were employed in the German submarine personnel, out of whom not more than 1,500 were adrift at any one time.

Against these forces was opposed the navies of Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States, with a personnel of at least a million men, and there were daily pitted against the Germans 5,000 antisubmarine craft.

The shipping loss of the world ran to 12,750,000 tons, with an aggregate monetary value of seven billions. Our Navy built more than 750 vessels to fight the submarine.

It is absolutely absurd—

Says Admiral Sims in his book—

to say that a belligerent which was losing 800,000 or 900,000 tons of shipping a month, as was the case with the Allies in the spring of 1917, was the undisputed mistress of the seas.

A little study of this subject will give to some people who talk glibly about "control of the seas" a fundamental knowledge of the subject.

Says Rear Admiral Fullam, testifying before the Senate committee:

Subsequent to the armistice and two years after Admiral Sims went to England a new naval force, then in its infancy, has been developed—the Naval Air Force—and to-day this force operates with the other forces to decide who shall and who shall not control the seas.

The backbone needs still more assistance.

The surface fleet and the hitherto easy path of controlling the seas needs another ally—a force above it as well as a force below it. Without these two forces—if the enemy possesses both—the surface fleet can control nothing.

The value of the airplane based on what is in reality a capital ship, a 35,000-ton airplane carrier, is equally evident to the layman. As a weapon its encounter with the battleship would be a foregone conclusion dollar for dollar. The bombing experiments now taking place off the Virginia Capes furnish an interesting confirmation of this statement. The battleship costs $39,000,000 without ammunition. The fighting plane costs $39,000. A thousand airplanes for the cost of a single battleship.

The airplane travels five times as fast as the capital ship, carries six 1,000-pound bombs, and fires them by letting them drop. The bombs will penetrate all decks down to the protective deck, and then explode with such force as to put out of action any ship now built or designed, or acting as a depth bomb they will sink or put out of action any ship if they fall in the water within 60 feet of her hull.

The plane is relatively immune from antiaircraft guns, whose record of hits in the late war in Europe was 1 in 1,000 on land, and still less at sea.

Admiral Sims gives as his conclusion from all the facts and claims that an airplane carrier "would be unharmed, and a few, if any, of her planes would be shot down, while a duel would inevitably result in the destruction or disablement of the battleship," but the admiral's war game contemplates one airplane carrier would handle 80 planes on board. Such a vessel costs $28,600,000, and its 80 planes, $3,120,000, so that for $31,720,000 it is expert judgment that $39,000,000,000 can be knocked out.

The war purpose of a battleship is to carry explosives to a point where they can be delivered most certainly at the enemy from the deck as a gun platform. It is mobile artillery on the water. It has twelve 16-inch guns, and the latest models fire 1-ton shells up to 200 discharges. The total is 5,000,000 pounds of explosives for the enemy.

Then the guns are worn out.

The monetary equivalent of the capital ship, 1,000 airplanes, can carry 6,000,000 pounds of explosives on one trip. They have no rifling to wear out; they lose but 1 craft out of 1,000 on each trip by direct fire, and they can make five times as many trips as the fastest surface ship.

Efficiency would seem to lie with the flying ship.

This comparison is extremely interesting, and only to-day my distinguished colleague from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], like myself a new Member of this House, and I were discussing with great interest this very phase of the naval armament situation.

At the present time the United States has a most rapidly expanding Navy, and coming as I do from the Pacific coast, so long as the mad race for armament is on it is not my desire that my country shall lag behind other nations, but I am discussing this question at such length because I believe we would not be keeping the faith toward ourselves and posterity were we not to take full cognizance of the desperate situation which is even now upon us

The Navy Department has rejected every effort to halt construction of the 1916 program of 156 warships, and it is being fulfilled practically intact, with the exception of the substitution of two airplane carriers for 18 smaller vessels, and perhaps some minor changes of which I am not informed.

Great Britain is at a standstill, and Japan is trying to find the resources for its so-called 8-8 program—that is, eight battleships and eight battle cruisers.

France is standing still, and Italy, the other power, is really no longer in rivalry.

What, then, is the policy behind the three largest fleets?

The General Board of the Navy Department, on November 9, 1915, made a report which establishes both the basis and the purpose for the current building program.

Europe was aflame in the first throes of the World War. How long are we to continue to use the yardstick designated as a measure for conditions which no longer exist?

A resolution was passed by the Senate on January 25 last calling upon its Committee on Naval Affairs—to report to the Senate whether, in its opinion, it is practicable and also a sound policy to suspend our naval building program now in progress for the period of six months, and to the end that a full investigation and free discussion may be had as to what constitutes a modern fighting Navy—a Navy with the types of ships and with the air and submarine weapons that would be most effective in the strategy and tactics of future war on the sea—and also to the end that we may avail ourselves in the matter both as to economy and efficiency on any possible agreement between naval powers providing for the reduction of armament.

Perfectly plain, is it not, my friends?

But the committee on February 9 reported that in its opinion—

It is not practical, and it is not sound policy to suspend the naval construction program of the United States now in progress for a period of six months nor at all.

Most significant of all is that this decision was based on the report from our friends, the gentlemen of the General Board of the Navy. Note that.

The British situation is far different. The first lord of the Admiralty, Walter Long, last December recalled that at one time Britain had a naval policy of maintaining a fleet equal to the next three; then, during the period of German activity, equal to the next two; and now, as a result of changed conditions due to the World War, equal to the strongest. That is exactly what the General Board of the American Navy says. This significant, not to say revolutionary, change in British policy has stayed practically two years unnoticed by America.

Now, how about Japan's policy in the matter? In an interview of January 22, Takashi Hara, the Japanese premier, is quoted in the Philadelphia Public Ledger as follows:

Although Japan to-day is recruiting larger navy plans, she is not ambitious to attack any other nation. The press stories asserting that Japan is building a navy against a hypothetical foe, and that that foe is America, are fantastic nonsense. Even with the present program completed, Japan's naval strength still will be far less than required for an attack on America. The Pacific Ocean is wide, America is rich, distant, and powerful, and should Japan hope to attack the United States she must build a navy far greater than America's. Even those who ascribe the most aggressive motives to Japan on account of her naval construction must know that the present Government simply is executing an old program. The purpose of our building is obvious and simple. It is for the defense of our commerce and coasts, and nothing more. Our naval experts believe the present navy is insufficient for this purpose, and hence we must continue building.

The Japanese have been quick to learn.

Please note how aptly they have adopted the "old-program" excuse. Perhaps they are not to be blamed, for since she took up western civilization we note that she has also consistently increased her expenditures for military and naval armaments. I have no doubt but that the common people of Japan are staggering to a greater extent even than ourselves under the burden of armament imposed upon them by their militarists and statesmen.

The armament problem was inevitably one of the subjects to be considered in the settlement of the World War. There were two possible points of view at the time of the armistice. One was to arrange for a change at the time, and the other was to arrange for the future. The allied and associated powers, the victors, decided not to change their own status at the moment except to record in the several treaties of peace that the armament clauses there set forth were imposed upon the enemy "in order to render possible the initiation of the general limitation of armaments of all nations." In other words, limitation was made the price of defeat, and the moral effect of a self-determined ordinance on the part of the victors was carefully avoided. Clinging to armament at a time when it could have easily been relinquished is one of the things that civilization does.

It has been said that underlying our unwillingness to become a member in the so-called League of Nations was this realization on the part of the American people that the victor powers had not fully met the limitation of armament problem so far as they themselves were concerned. Looking to the future, the allied and associated powers were not quite so evasive. Their mutual agreement, which was fine for the immediate participation of the moment and is now binding upon 48 States, is to be found in articles 8 and 9 of the covenants of the League of Nations, and those articles are positive injunctions from which something must come if good faith exists in the world. The details will not be fully discussed forthwith, because it is not for the moment possible to say how all powers which before the war were undoubtedly the cause of armament increase have been treated in this respect by a victory over them. Quite properly, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey had their level of armament set for them at Paris, and in each country military, naval, and air commissions of the victorious powers are now existing with the sole duty of seeing that the imposed conditions are fulfilled. Had the victors gone a step further and voluntarily, by mutual agreement, limited their own armaments, the world would perhaps not be facing what is before it to-day. It should be understood, in reading the data provided, that they have been revised to accord with the undisputed facts secured from allied sources. Looking at the situation as a whole, none of the enemy States, except Germany and Turkey, is under suspicion of nonfulfillment. As to Germany, the outstanding matters in dispute are technically rather than actually important from the present armament point of view. So it is an undisputed fact that our late enemies are no longer to be counted in the running, so far as armaments are concerned. The treaty of Versailles has taken care of that.

It is among the victors, then, that this great question must be discussed and solved if we are really to be not only the victors but victorious in the late World War.

Grotius, the father of international law, laid down the definition of war, which has not been extended through the intervening centuries. "War," he said, "is a state of contending parties considered as such." But he added a most important thought which has scarcely been mentioned since:

> Justice is not included in the definition of war, because the very point to be decided is whether any war be just or what war may be so called. Therefore we must make a distinction between war and the justice of it.

Nevertheless, the Romans have provided war as an institution of law—that is, of justice—sometimes abstract, sometimes concrete.

No question can arise of the justice of our entry into the late war. No more just nor holy mission was ever accomplished by a nation than when we saved civilization for the future generations of mankind; but it is evident to all that in entering war, just though the cause of one of the combatants may be, lined on the other side are the forces of the unjust. And wars are often waged where justice and right are on neither side. So the distinction made between war itself and the justice of it is ofttimes academic.

In résumé and in order to locate ourselves along the devious highway which we have set out to travel in discussing this subject, let us ask ourselves the question, At just what point have we arrived internationally at the present moment? I would say that we are just at the point in the development of our moral sense in national and international relations where we are willing to set down and discuss with other nations a definite policy and sincerely seek a fair remedy of a malady with which we are all afflicted. Perhaps at the beginning all of us may desire to reserve a fairly extensive right to decide whether the third party shall be a deciding vote or an advisory board of inquiry either in the matter of carrying out the terms of a limitation of armaments agreement or the actual use of those armaments in a possible future military or naval encounter.

If we take account of the adaptability of mankind in applying technicalities to its own advantage and assume that the possibilities of war are larger so that States can find other avenues of getting through the rules into war, justice would be a pretty dubious quantity; but let us assume that all have entered into a conference such as has been under discussion and that all the rules are complied with, armaments are limited in accordance with agreement, and that there is a war. There would, of course, be a cause, real or unreal. It might be a mixture of the two. Generally the victor invariably enters the war on a limited grievance and places the victim under an unlimited liability in the end. Be this as it may, the machinery for preventing the nations from reaching a point where they have "casus belli" which they can put to the trial of a war without arraying the rest of the world against them, as happened to Germany, is pretty well developed. But if that point is reached, why not confine the fighting entirely within the limits of the declared object? Would not a limitation of armaments trend at least in this direction?

Grotius partially admitted the right of a State to wage a just war. But that kind of a dictum suspended in the national and international fogs of emotionalism and self-interest means nothing, because it takes no account of the ability of mankind to translate evil into good. Even the Germanic powers prated to the world in the beginning of the World War that "justice was on their side."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the lady from Oklahoma [Miss ROBERTSON], whom we are all glad is here [applause], and gentlemen, the armaments problem is nothing more nor less than policy and fear. The world has passed beyond the stage when any nation maintains an armament for mere pomp. But what we do understand is that an armament is not kept for itself. It is impossible to fight a war without armament, and it is even more impossible to get into a war unless policy leads there. True, the possession of armament sometimes predisposes policy to create the opportunity to use it. In other words, armament is dangerously the barometer of policy. Seldom will there be any employment of armament which is not enjoined or dictated by policy. Policy may be inspired by a mixture of emotions—necessity, sentiment, justice, and many other emotions, pure and impure. Motive is the cardinal point which has been so signally disregarded by the nations. Few nations have been guided by as altruistic considerations in the use of their armaments as has the United States of America.

No one of them has ever done the essential thing of making those who conduct their foreign relations primarily responsible for determining the level preparations for war. Instead of that perfectly simple effort, the people have permitted the military elements to whip up their fears and have rewarded the politicians who invented the biggest bugaboos. There has been enough real cause for fear in the world, but it has been so generously mixed with imagination that peoples have seldom been able to distinguish the false from the true. The real danger in international life should be properly met by facing the determined facts. Alas! how often do we seek to avoid them. With the proper responsibility placed upon those who direct the Nation's policy rather than left to those who have undertaken the technical duty of seeing to the preparations for defense, we at least have some hope for improvement.

This Nation has ever been in the forefront in blazing new trails, and the American Congress, guided and inspired by the American people and under the able leadership of one of the most distinguished Presidents who ever sat in the White House, should here and now covenant, in the presence of the Almighty—to whom after all we owe the highest responsibility—to commit and dedicate itself to the high and worthy purpose, through association and agreement, to limit armaments and to give a living expression to the spirit of Him who nearly 2,000 years ago enjoined that there be "Peace on earth and good will toward men." [Prolonged applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINDRED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of world peace and limitation of armament.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 72. Joint resolution for the relief of States in the cotton belt that have given aid to cotton farmers forced from the fields in established nonproduction zones through efforts to eradicate the pink bollworm; to the Committee on Agriculture.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED RADIO STATIONS.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call up House joint resolution No. 7.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up House joint resolution No. 7, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This joint resolution is on the Union Calendar, and the House therefore automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. J. Res. 7, to amend section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1920, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1920, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, under the terms and conditions and at rates prescribed by him, which rates shall be just and reasonable, and which, upon complaint, shall be subject to review and revision by the Interstate Commerce Commission, to use all radio stations and apparatus, wherever located, owned by the United States and under the control of the Navy Department—(a) for the reception and transmission of press messages offered by any newspaper published in the United States, its Territories or possessions, or published by citizens of the United States in foreign countries, or by any press association of the United States; and (b) for the reception and transmission of private commercial messages: Provided, That the rates fixed for the reception and transmission of all such messages, other than press messages between the Pacific coast of the United States and the Orient, shall not be less than the rates charged by privately owned and operated stations for like messages and service: Provided further, That the right to use such stations for any of the purposes named in this section, except for the reception and transmission of press messages, other than press messages between the Atlantic coast of the United States and ships at sea, shall terminate and cease as between any countries or localities or between any locality and privately operated ships whenever privately owned and operated stations are capable of meeting the normal communication requirements between such countries or localities or between any locality and privately operated ships, and the Secretary of Commerce shall have notified the Secretary of the Navy thereof, and all rights conferred by this section shall terminate and cease in any event two years from the date this resolution takes effect.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 4, after the word "event," strike out "two years from the date this resolution takes effect" and insert "on June 30, 1922."

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] and reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this joint resolution amends a joint resolution which went into effect on June 5, 1920, only with reference to the use of radio stations under control of the Government—which means practically in the Navy Department—for the transmission and reception of press messages.

The resolution of June 5, 1920, was passed after considerable hearings by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and was designed to establish the relations from that time between the Navy Department, in the operation of radio stations, and privately owned radio stations. As is well known, during the war the Navy Department took over practically all of the radio stations of the country and placed them under Government control for use for war purposes. When the armistice had been signed and the war practically ended the private radio companies were very anxious that their properties and facilities should be returned to them, and bills were introduced to effect that result.

By reason of the pressure thus brought the Navy Department did relinquish its control of the radio stations and radio apparatus which it had taken over during the war except those which had been actually purchased by the department. Thereupon the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries reported to the House what was known in the Sixty-sixth Congress as Senate joint resolution 170, and an amendment, which was a substitute for the entire Senate resolution, was passed by the House, and subsequently received the approval of the Senate and became a law, as stated, on June 5, 1920. That resolution of June 5, 1920, provided, briefly, first, that all land, ship, and airship radio stations and all apparatus owned by the United States might be used by the Government for the receiving and transmitting of messages relating to Government business, compass reports, and the safety of ships at sea. For these purposes the Navy Department may use radio stations until Congress shall determine otherwise. Section 2 of the joint resolution of June 5, 1920, gave the Navy Department authority to receive and transmit commercial messages, including press messages, until such time as the private radio companies would be able to supply adequate facilities for the handling of such business, but in no event beyond June 5, 1922; that is to say, in no event beyond two years after the date when the resolution of June 5, 1920, took effect.

The Secretary of Commerce was authorized to determine when private radio business could adequately handle the business, and when he would notify the Secretary of the Navy that the private radio companies could adequately handle the business the Secretary of the Navy was required to discontinue the use of the naval stations and Navy apparatus for handling of private commercial business.

However, it was the clear intention of the resolution of June 5, 1920, to differentiate between ordinary commercial business and press messages. In fact, the resolution of June 5, 1920, was reported to the House largely on account of conditions which existed then, and which still exist, on the Pacific coast with reference to the transmission of intelligence between our country and the Orient.

So it was distinctly intended, and some of us have contended that it was practically stated in the resolution of June 5, 1920, that press messages and press business were to receive different treatment than other commercial business under the terms of the resolution. However, the Secretary of Commerce notified the Secretary of the Navy that the private radio facilities were adequate for handling commercial business, and did not differentiate between other commercial business and press messages, with the result that the newspapers and press associations were cut off from the use of the radio stations of the Navy for the transmission and reception of their messages.

For this reason the representatives of the newspapers and press associations came before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries early this year and made complaint to that committee, and after much consideration, after several hearings, the committee reported to the Sixty-sixth Congress a resolution practically the same as this which is now up for consideration here.

This resolution amends the act of June 5, 1920, only in a few particulars. The principal effect of the amendments is that they permit and authorize the Navy Department to use its facilities for the reception and transmission of press messages until June 30, 1922, without any interference or interruption by the Secretary of Commerce. Early this year a representative of practically the entire press of the country went to Europe to negotiate contracts with European radio companies and with European Governments operating radio service in order to improve communications from Europe to the United States. He and other representatives of the press of the country found that in order to make proper arrangements in Europe so as to get proper news service from Europe to the United States it would be very desirable that they might offer continuous, uninterrupted, and adequate service from the United States to Europe. With the provision still in effect in the resolution of June 5, 1920, which permitted the Secretary of Commerce to terminate the activities of the Secretary of the Navy in handling press dispatches, it was impossible for the press representative to give any such assurance to the European Governments and radio operators, and therefore the amendments which are proposed here in the resolution now before us provide that the Secretary of the Navy shall have authority to continue the service which he is now giving to the press of the country both on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts to newspapers without interruption or interference until June 30, 1922. We extend the date from June 5, 1922. You will observe that the committee has recommended a slight amendment in the bill introduced by myself, substituting "for two years" the words "June 30, 1922." That was done because some had the apprehension that perhaps the reenactment of section 2 of the act of June 5, 1920, now would extend the time two years from this time, but such was not the intention of the committee. The intention of the committee was to make the amendment and change effective until June 5, 1922, and in order to adopt a date which would be of the same date as the termination of the fiscal year and the end of the calendar month, the committee recommended this amendment changing the time to June 30, 1922.

One other provision and amendment in the resolution as now proposed is that the press associations and newspapers shall be required to pay the same rates which are charged by private companies, except in the service upon the Pacific Ocean. I want to say that while this may seem to impose a burden on the newspapers which was not contained in the act of June 5, 1920, the newspapers of the country themselves suggested that in the interest of securing this legislation they were willing to have that provision inserted, particularly inasmuch as it is their intention to pay the same rates to the Government that they would pay to the private companies, and it is not their purpose to seek any cheaper service from the Government than they could get elsewhere.

UMI

Mr. CONNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. CONNELL. Why are the rates on the Pacific limited?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am very glad the gentleman has asked that question. I am coming to that. An exception was made in the case of the Pacific coast, because on the Pacific coast a very unusual and peculiar situation exists. That matter was thoroughly considered in the discussion of the act of June 5, 1920. Representatives, not only of the newspapers but of large communities on the Pacific coast, appeared before the Merchant Marine Committee and asked that on the Pacific coast they shall be permitted to continue giving service at the present rates, which are slightly less than those which would be charged by private companies, if the private companies were able to handle the business, but the private companies are not able to handle the business, and we consider it so important——

Mr. CONNELL. But they are on the Atlantic coast?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. On the Atlantic coast they are able to handle ordinary commercial business, in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce, but they are not yet able to handle all of the press business. A new station is being constructed on Long Island which is expected to be finished by next year, and when that has been completed it is hoped that private companies on the Atlantic coast will be able to handle all of the business there, but it is desired that until then the Navy shall have full authority without any interruption or interference by the Commerce Department to give this service, and that it shall be authorized to make a contract or contracts up to June 30, 1922, so that American newspapers may go to Europe and offer definite and adequate service without question until that time. So far as the Pacific coast is concerned, I think there is practical unanimity of opinion not only in the committee but in the House that that situation deserves a little different treatment than that on the Atlantic coast. I do not think it is necessary to go into any further discussion of that question now, except to say that private facilities are entirely inadequate on the Pacific coast, that we have foreign competition which renders it very desirable that our newspapers and press associations and intelligence agencies shall be able to communicate as freely and as cheaply as possible with the Orient.

Mr. CONNELL. I thank the gentleman. I simply asked for information.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I believe I have covered practically all of the questions involved in this resolution. It amends the resolution of June 5, 1920, only in these two particulars: It is not intended, by the committee at least, to extend or enlarge Government operation of radio facilities for private business. This is done only in the interest of giving adequate service to the press of the country until such time as private facilities may be adequate, and I want to say that personally I feel that the matter of giving adequate service to the press, when it is done without granting any subsidy to the press in the way of reduced rates or cheaper service, is a matter of at least quasi-public importance, and the policy which we adopted on June 5, 1920, I think should be continued uninterrupted until the termination of that resolution by its own terms in June, 1922.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Can the gentleman give us any idea of the extent of the private companies operating on the Atlantic?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Private companies on the Atlantic coast to-day——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman know how many stations there are?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not believe I can give the number. The number is given in the hearings somewhere.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. From what points do communications go?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of private companies?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. From New York City, from Jersey City, from Boston, from Cape Cod——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. They communicate with ships that are coming in?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, that is ship-to-shore business. That is not affected by this resolution. This is only transoceanic business.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There are communications between the Atlantic coast and the coast of Europe?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, answering the question of the gentleman from Indiana, I have not the details clearly in mind, but I know this, that there are transoceanic stations at various places along the Atlantic coast. There is one in Maine, one at Chatham, one at Marion, both in Massachusetts, and there are several in the vicinity of New York. There is one of the largest stations in the world now in process of construction on Long Island, to be in full operation it is believed by the early part of next year. There are stations in New Jersey, at Tuckerton, and at other points. These I have mentioned, and a few others on the Atlantic coast, are now able to communicate and do communicate with England, with Norway, with France, with Germany, and they are communicating, I believe, or are soon to communicate, with stations in Poland. We have general communications back and forth between this country on the Atlantic coast and European nations.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Can the gentleman from Maine, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit, tell us anything about the ownership of those different stations? Are they owned by American companies or foreign companies?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think those in this country now are all owned by American companies. There is one large company—the Radio Corporation of America—which took over the American Marconi Co., and it is the principal agency for wireless communication in this country on the Atlantic seaboard. There are some other smaller stations and smaller companies operating on the Atlantic coast and on the Pacific coast.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is there any regulation with reference to radio communication in this country from foreign countries?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Of course, we can not regulate what is done overseas by foreign countries. There is regulation of rates of radio companies by the railroad act, which passed last year, and there is now pending before the Merchant Marine Committee what I would like to call a comprehensive radio bill, dealing with many phases of this radio situation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Has any question of monopolistic franchises in foreign countries been brought to the attention of the committee?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Yes; that question has been discussed at various times. It is a question that is rather difficult for us to deal with, because, of course, the authority of any foreign nation to grant its franchises or concessions is something over which we have no control.

In other words, if an American company goes across to Europe or goes to South America and gathers up franchises and concessions, that is something that is primarily within the control of the foreign Government with which it deals. In this bill, to which I have already referred, which is pending before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and on which we hope soon to have hearings, that subject is undertaken to be dealt with somewhat.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Well, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit just a little bit further, I would like to make a suggestion to the committee, that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had before it the question of the control of international cables, and recently we passed an act by which the President has control of all submarine cables, and it occurred to me that if the cables are to be controlled by the President of the United States, there is not any reason why the wireless communications should not also be controlled.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman permit me to say that this resolution now before the House in only two—I think rather minor—respects amends the resolution of June 5, 1920? The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the subcommittee which handled this matter did not think it wise to go into hearings and open up a discussion upon the whole question of radio, its control and operation, by this Government here and in other countries, in the consideration of these minor amendments to a resolution already in effect.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the committee is quite right, and I am quite in sympathy with the purpose of this resolution, and I think it ought to be passed; but it occurred to me that while the subject was up the gentleman's committee, which has charge of this, ought to have in mind the fact that there is not any good purpose served in giving the President control of cables if you go over his head with wireless communications.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to say to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana and others that the subcommittee of which I am a member and the entire committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries have had that very matter under discussion, and Mr. WHITE of Maine has introduced a bill upon which as soon as we get other things out of the way we are going to have hearings, and it is the purpose of the committee to bring in a comprehensive law upon the subject of radio communications. There has not been any legislation since the act of 1912 was passed.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do.

Mr. LONDON. Is the establishment of radio stations regulated by law?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Under the act of 1912.

Mr. LONDON. There is no private company that can establish radio stations without complying with certain requirements of the law?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They must get a permit from the Department of Commerce.

Mr. LONDON. That is the only regulation?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not quite that.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Of course, the act of 1912 has in it very comprehensive regulations with respect to the use of radio stations, and then, of course, there are now in force some international conventions with respect to radio which must be observed by an operating company in this country.

Mr. LONDON. I am wondering why the Associated Press does not establish its own radio stations.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say to the gentleman that we asked them that question, and they said that they did not want to go into other business than their own. There is much complaint about certain business interests trying to take over other business, and if the newspapers were to establish radio stations of their own some such stations at least would not be sufficiently supported to justify them in carrying only their own messages, and they might come in competition with other business, and they have no desire to do that. Their only desire was to get an adequate service.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I have been puzzled over the word "commercial," line 11, second page, and before asking the question I have exhausted the authorities to find what construction was put upon it. What I want to know is this—whether there is anything here by which private communications not commercial in their nature could be excluded by this bill, as, for instance, announcements of death, marriages, births, and similar things. Now, was it in the contemplation of the committee to include such communications under the word "commercial"?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. All of these private messages come under the head of commercial messages. Commercial messages are messages sent for hire relating to matters not public.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Are not commercial messages properly classified as messages with regard to matters of commerce, trade, business, banking, and that sort of thing?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not necessarily; they include the same kind of messages as are handled by private companies relating to private affairs.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I apprehend that in the operating companies they are classified as commercial messages to distinguish them from Government messages, from press messages, and other messages——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me say to the gentleman that the Department of Commerce has construed the term as I have stated it, as I am informed.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. It has been so construed? I am glad to know it, as I can not find any judicial construction, and that is why I asked the question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The Department of Commerce has passed upon this matter and given the construction. I do not think any of these matters have gone to the courts, and until a term gets to the court, and it construes it differently, of course, the decision of the Department of Commerce stands.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Would there be any objection on the part of the committee to inserting the word "and" in line 11, making it read "private and commercial" messages, or leaving out the word "commercial"? I do not think anybody wants to shut out other messages which are not technically commercial.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes. I do not think it is the purpose that the Navy Department shall be permitted to send messages, for instance, relating to death of citizens generally not in the public service nor having any connection with the Government. I do not think it is the intention that private messages as distinguished from the kind of commercial messages the gentleman has suggested should have the privilege of using Government apparatus and stations.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Was it your purpose to exclude or permit announcement of deaths, marriages, and births?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They are under exactly the same regulations and restrictions and have the same benefits, if there are any, as any other messages relating to private affairs.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield in connection with the inquiry of my colleague? This is the same language as in the original resolution?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The question occurred to me that has been raised by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES]. I noticed in the original resolution you had two kinds of messages, namely, press messages and private commercial messages.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As I understand it, the department in connection with this other resolution has construed the private commercial messages to include all kinds of messages outside of Government and press messages.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say, outside of those which were covered by section 1 of the resolution. Section 1 of the resolution 170 of the Sixty-sixth Congress permits such apparatus in Government stations to be used for receiving and transmitting messages relating to Government business, compass reports, and safety of ships. It is assumed that those messages will be sent practically free of charge. They are matters of public concern; but all other matters, I apprehend, would come under the head of private commercial messages.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. If the gentleman so construes it, I will not ask him to amend it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I understand that private telegraph companies and radio companies all understand the term "commercial messages" in that sense.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether at any time during the operation of Government wireless stations it has transmitted press or commercial messages overland? The gentleman stated that this bill is limited only to transoceanic messages. I do not see anything in the phraseology which restricts it to that purpose.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I made that remark in connection with some inquiry as to the press service on the Pacific Ocean, and I said that the only press service which will be affected by this amendment is the press service on the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee whether the Government is engaging in the business of transmitting press and private commercial messages overland between cities on the continent?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is not. At the present time the Government is not handling any private commercial or private business of any sort, except press messages, because the Department of Commerce last November notified the Navy Department that press facilities were adequate for the handling of all business outside of public business.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any information as to whether private wireless companies operate between Detroit and Cleveland, for instance, or whether those cities have radio stations operated by the Government? I know the service has been vastly improved to the citizens of both Cleveland and Detroit by the transmission of their messages by wireless, but I do not know whether they are transmitted by private companies or by Government-operated stations.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There are private companies operating there now.

Mr. STAFFORD. So the Government is not in any instance at the present time transmitting messages, press, commercial, or otherwise, throughout the continent of the United States?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The hearings which were held upon this very resolution disclosed that the Navy Department has now abandoned all private business, with the single exception of the press business.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from Illinois. I think he has, perhaps, explained what that proviso at the end of the bill means, but I wish the gentleman would dwell a little at length in order to give a clear meaning of the proviso after line 16, on page 2.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] desires to ask a question first.

Mr. LONDON. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question on this same line. The Interstate Commerce Commission has got to review the rates which the Secretary of the Navy charges for messages?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. In view of that power being lodged in the Interstate Commerce Commission, what is the necessity for providing that the Secretary of the Navy shall not charge certain rates or shall charge rates which will be less than the rates of private companies?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Shall not charge certain rates? Will the gentleman be specific?

Mr. LONDON. Now, you provide that the Secretary of the Navy shall charge less for press messages than private companies shall charge. Is not that the provision?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. State that again, please.

Mr. LONDON. You require that the rates for press messages shall be less than the rates charged by private companies?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They shall not be less.

Mr. LONDON. That they shall be less.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is only on the Pacific coast.

Mr. LONDON. On the Pacific coast.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; on the Pacific coast. We do not say that. We do say that they do not have to be as much as the rates charged by private companies; that is, they may be less.

Mr. LONDON. You say except other than press messages on the Atlantic coast, the rates for press messages on the Pacific coast shall be less. That is the effect of your resolution.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No; the exception is that for press messages between the Pacific coast of the United States and the Orient the rates may be less than those charged by private companies.

Mr. LONDON. What is the object had in view by those who desire this resolution to become a law?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The object is to permit the same rates to remain in effect that are now in effect, which are less than the rates charged by commercial companies on the Pacific coast.

Mr. LONDON. Are these rates unreasonably high, or are they unreasonably low?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Which rates—the private rates or the Government rates?

Mr. LONDON. The Government rates, that are now being charged.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think they are reasonably low. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to this fact, and then perhaps he will not pursue the inquiry further: The Interstate Commerce Commission has the authority to review rates, not to originate them. They simply act upon complaints. These provisions relate to the origination of rates, to the establishment of rates, but of course any rate established would be subject to review by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Am I correct about that, I will ask the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. The gentleman is correct. The right to review rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission is the right, whenever they have them too high, to make them lower; but the Interstate Commerce Commission has not the power to say, "Your rates are too low; you have got to make them higher." So you have to have a specific provision if you are going to bring that about.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Exactly.

Mr. CONNELL. In other words, the Interstate Commerce Commission can not revise rates upward?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. No. They can revise them downward only.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. So far as the railroad rates are concerned, we did give them that power, but they do not have it with reference to wire lines, and formerly they did not have it with reference to railroad rates.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The chairman of the committee has announced that he reserves the balance of his time after I shall have concluded. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 20 minutes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], and ask that it be reserved for him.

Mr. HARDY of Texas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not care to discuss this bill myself to any great extent, but I wish to reserve my time after I shall have concluded and yield it to other gentlemen.

I will say that the only objection I have to this measure is that it is, in my judgment, too restrictive, and I think the amendment that will be offered to the bill by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] ought to be accepted. In other words, I think the radio service of the Government, where it is now absolutely essential, ought to receive fair treatment, and ought in no event to end before June 30, 1922. The real fact is that I am not in very thorough accord with the sentiment or principle underlying this measure, in some degree at least. That is a sentiment that Government service must be supplied where it is needed, but ought to be so restricted that it can not possibly become self-sustaining for fear it might compete with some private enterprise. I am of opinion that where the Government perforce is required to have certain public facilities, it ought naturally to be allowed to use those facilities to make the enterprise of the Government not a failure, not a loss, but so far as possible and practicable, without injuring the private business, a success and a profitable one.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think I understand the gentleman, and I think that the other members of the committee understand the gentleman. I take it that the gentleman's position is this: That he is not opposed to this bill, but he does not think it goes far enough.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think that this bill is too restrictive, in that it says that the right to use these naval radio stations for the purposes named in the bill shall terminate at all events on June 30, 1922. I think it ought not in any event to terminate before that time, and not then if, in the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce, it is still needed. The trouble about it is that the naval radio stations are kept up in the air; they are kept without any knowledge as to how long they are going to be permitted to operate at all. They may be stopped at any time, and then you make a final provision that they shall at all events be stopped on June 30, 1922. I think the resolution ought to say in no event should service permitted be taken away before that time.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Was not one of the purposes of agreeing to this amendment that private companies might know of a definite date when they would be freed from governmental competition in this activity?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And yet the gentleman, through his bill passed a year ago, in June, 1920, recognized the fact that conditions were such that it was a service that the Government had to render, because nobody else could or would render it, and the Government goes to work to supply that service.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The gentleman refers to me. Of course, the gentleman knows that if I had my way I would not support it at all. I support it merely because I think it is a compromise between conflicting views.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman takes the same position that I take myself; that is, the measure is a compromise. I think it is as far from representing my view as it is from representing the gentleman's view.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I think the gentleman and I are as far apart as the poles.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman does not think it is wise, but thinks it is the best he can do. In my judgment I think the House ought to pass upon this question as to whether abruptly the right to use these naval radio powers should be terminated, regardless of all conditions, as stated in this bill, on June 30, 1922.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Referring to the provision that the gentleman has been discussing, I want to call the attention of the committee to the specific provision that the gentleman from Texas has been discussing. It is provided that the right to use these stations, and so forth, shall terminate under certain conditions "whenever privately owned and operated stations are capable of meeting the normal communication requirements between such countries or localities," and so forth, "and the Secretary of Commerce shall have notified the Secretary of the Navy thereof." I presume it was the intention to give the Secretary of Commerce the right to make that determination. But it is not appropriately phrased.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is in the language of the act of June 5, 1920. I myself thought that there should be a provision for a hearing and possibly for a review. But at that time this was compromise language, and it has passed both the House and the Senate in exactly this language.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think we all thought there ought to be a hearing before the Secretary of Commerce should notify the Secretary of the Navy that his activities in this radio service must cease.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not want to be understood as contending that there should be a hearing. That is not my point. My point is that the ascertainment and determination of that fact is not located anywhere, but the mere notification of the fact is by the Secretary of Commerce. He notifies the Secretary of the Navy, but there is no officer who is given the function of determining the fact. In many of the acts that we passed with reference to the termination of the war, the termination of the emergency, and so forth, we provided that that determination should be by the President, and that he should issue a proclamation to that effect.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Upon ascertainment of certain facts.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think it would have been better to provide that as soon as the Secretary of Commerce shall have ascertained certain facts he shall notify the Secretary of the Navy to that effect, but the presumption that we went on was that he would not notify the Secretary of the Navy that such was the fact unless he had ascertained it. There may be an omission in the language, but perhaps no Secretary of Commerce will act without at least believing that what he declares is true in fact.

Mr. Chairman, reserving the remainder of my time, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries are in entire accord that this joint resolution is a worthy one as far as it goes. Some think it does not go far enough, and perhaps there are some who are inclined to think it goes a trifle too far, but it is the judgment of all that it is the best legislation that can be obtained on the subject at this time and really provides most needed relief.

I want to say that the subject of radio communication is one that is engrossing the attention not only of those primarily and commercially interested in it but the public at large and all the civilized world, because the need for communication between different parts of the globe is becoming constantly greater, so that the facilities we now have are being taxed to the very limit of their capacity. It was for this reason that the Congress in June of last year adopted the resolution providing that radio stations controlled by the Navy Department might be used for commercial and press messages for two years from the date when that resolution went into effect. The provision was further carried, however, in that resolution that whenever the private companies were able to transact the business which was offered the use of the naval radio should cease for commercial and press messages. The power of determining when the commercial stations are adequate has been vested in the Secretary of Commerce. That official has notified the Secretary of the Navy whenever he reached that conclusion. It was not a conclusion which when once rendered settled the question for the future. In other words, the commercial radios might for a time be able to transact the commercial and press business. At other times they might be able to transact either the commercial or the press business, but not both, and at other times might not be able to transact either satisfactorily. The Department of Commerce, therefore, undertook from time to time to designate when the commercial radios were adequate and when they had ceased to be adequate. Perhaps it might allow the Navy to function in this service for a week or two or three weeks or four weeks and then shut down upon it. It might allow it to operate for a longer time, or perhaps in instances for a shorter time, until the press were unable to determine just when they could get that facility; and it has proved the greatest embarrassment and hindrance in transmitting promptly these important messages relating to great questions in which this country is so interested, so as to keep in constant touch with foreign affairs.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman recognizes that the trouble is lack of facilities on the other side of the Atlantic, not on this side. We have plenty of facilities over here. The press associations want to get on the other side and arrange for facilities over there. There are two ends to a radio message. If you have only one end, you can not get any message through.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand that. One of the statements which they made was that they wanted to utilize stations which were idle when these periods of congestion came about, and they were unnecessarily delayed in the transmission of their messages. The hearings which were held showed conclusively how often these embarrassments occurred; how the press messages were chopped up and delayed, and how the American public were prevented from getting news of the greatest importance at a time when it was real news and not history.

Now, this bill does not make any radical change in the law. It simply provides that up until June 30, 1922, press messages may be received by the naval radio without the limitations which have heretofore been imposed. It further provides, so as to safeguard the commercial companies, that the rates shall be just and reasonable, and that in no case shall the message rates be lower than the commercial rates charged by the commercial companies, except on the Pacific coast in radio communication with the Far East. That is largely due, as I understand, to the lack of private facilities on that coast so as to supply the demand which is constantly being made for that service.

Now, I observe in this matter of adequate radio facilities that the difficulty which is being encountered, and which ought to be relieved at the earliest moment, is one which ought to have been relieved some time since, and that the condition which obtained last December when the hearings were held still obtains now; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], the author of this measure, I think has rather pointedly demonstrated to the House just what the existing necessity is.

There is another feature that, perhaps, does not have as close a relation to the identical provisions of this bill as it might have, but still relevant and highly important, about which I desire to say a few words, and that is the difficulty which is even now being experienced in the Navy to secure enough radio operators to man the stations and service which the Navy has and controls in this country. As you gentlemen know, many of the Marconi stations were taken over by the naval radio during the war, and under the provisions of the act that we passed here in June, 1920, control of them has been provided for until June, 1922, when Government operation of such stations must cease.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Why is it that private individuals who want to establish radio stations at certain points in the United States are prohibited by the department, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman mean the Navy Department?

Mr. BLANTON. By the department having control of radio stations.

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not understand that private stations are prohibited from being established.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman from Texas will understand that only a certain amount of communications can go through any space of air.

Mr. BLANTON. The war is over, and radio business ought to be established upon a reasonable, commercial, competitive basis.

Mr. EDMONDS. When a man goes to the Department of Commerce and asks for a permit or authorization for establishing a radio station within a certain distance where there is going to be a disturbance in the waves, they have to limit the number of permits for stations in that vicinity.

Mr. BLANTON. But in some instances they have refused permits where there were no radio stations near by.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Texas five minutes more.

Mr. BRIGGS. I do not understand that there is any effort in the least to cripple the establishment of private radio stations wherever they can be properly created or established. The one purpose now is to utilize the radio naval stations to respond to the great demand from the business men throughout the United States and the people generally, who want the facilities of the naval radio stations because they have been unable for some time past to get adequate communication through private radio systems.

I said a moment ago that the naval radio service is finding itself in some degree embarrassed by lack of radio operators. In my own home city of Galveston the Navy controls the radio service. They also have control of the radio equipment of the Heald Bank Lightship, about 30 miles off the coast of that city. It is in the highest degree important that the service there at all times shall be maintained at the highest state of efficiency, so that there may constantly be every facility for communication not only with land stations but vessels at sea, for the direction and protection of shipping, for the location of ships, for the information of shippers, steamship agents, and operators, and also for the purpose of securing reports on weather conditions as well. I earnestly hope that it is going to be possible for the Navy to assign adequate personnel to man these stations which it now controls, and particularly those in localities where the service should be maintained at the highest state of efficiency.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRIGGS. Certainly.

Mr. LONDON. Are the radio operators civilian employees?

Mr. BRIGGS. I understand they are not; they may utilize the men in the reserve, but they do not use civilian employees.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to state at the outset that I am for this bill in its present form if we can not advantageously, as I view it, amend it. In other words, as has been stated by my colleague, Judge HARDY, my only objection to the bill is that it does not go far enough. I do not think it will meet the situation which it is designed to meet unless an amendment is made, which I shall later introduce. In order to get this matter before us, I think it will be very well to review the necessity for this legislation and the history of it up to this time.

To begin with, the necessity for legislation authorizing this service to be given to the press and also to the public generally on the part of the Government radio stations grew out of the fact that on February 29, 1920, the President, by Executive order, returned to the owners all of the privately owned radio systems which had been taken over by the Government during the war as a war emergency. And automatically, in accordance with the provisions of the radio act of 1912, the Government was deprived of the privilege of rendering service to the public where a private station was within 100 miles of the naval station in question. In order to meet that situation which arose, the Government being compelled to get out of the service and the privately owned stations not being able to render the required service, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GREENE, chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, on February 28, 1920, introduced House joint resolution 304, which in the preamble set out the facts that I have briefly mentioned, with the further provisions:

Whereas the provisions of the above-named act forbid the use of Government radio stations by the general public in case a commercial radio station operating continuously for general public service is located within 100 nautical miles thereof; and
Whereas the enforcement of this provision would be detrimental to American business interests, the press, and the general public; and
Whereas no commercial radio company is at present equipped to handle the large volume of traffic concerned: Therefore be it

Resolved—

And so forth.

Then said resolution authorized the Government radio stations to render the service to the public wherever privately owned stations were not in a position to do so. This bill as introduced by the chairman provided that the Government should get out of the service whenever privately owned radio stations in any locality were able to render the service, and the Secretary of Commerce should certify such fact to the Secretary of the Navy, but it did not place any such restrictions on press messages. It gave unrestricted, unlimited right for the Government service to be extended to the press. We had hearings upon that bill, and at a later date the representatives of the press appeared before us and indorsed and urged the passage of that resolution, and representatives of the Navy and others indorsed it. Representatives of privately owned radio stations appeared before the committee and opposed the resolution. They were really opposed to any legislation, but they wanted to weaken it all they could.

Out of deference to them, there was reported out a resolution which was enacted into law, House joint resolution 170, which is public resolution 48 of the Sixty-sixth Congress. I at the time thought, and I think now, that that resolution did not go far enough, that it was too restrictive, that it did not give enough latitude to insure this service being given to the public, and particularly the press; but the majority of the committee thought otherwise and reported out the resolution. Sure enough it developed that by reason of the restricted provisions a certain representative in the Department of Commerce took the lead, as I understand it, and gave notice to the Navy to get out of the service upon the ground that privately owned stations were then adequately equipped to render the service. So the Navy got out with respect to the New York station. What happened? It was admitted before our committee by the representative of the company which had served the notice upon the Secretary of the Navy that they were able to do the business that it developed subsequently that they were unable to render the service and that he had made a misrepresentation to the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Was not that on account of the lack of facilities on the other side of the ocean instead of on this side?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No. I say that the proof shows that it was on account of the lack of facilities not only on the other side but on this side.

Mr. EDMONDS. But mostly on the other side?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. And one reason they could not make satisfactory arrangements on the other side was because it was a new privately owned corporation, and that the Governments who owned the radio systems on the other side of the water were unwilling to make an arrangement with that company as they had done with the Government of the United States. That is the situation that is going to continue to arise in the future, because everyone knows that this great Government is in a better position to make satisfactory arrangements with Governments owning radio systems in France and Great Britain and other foreign nations than any privately owned concern, and these foreign systems are owned and operated by the Governments.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Can the gentleman inform the committee approximately how many stations there are, privately owned and operated, and why there are not more stations constructed by private concerns? Is it not a profitable business?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It depends entirely upon circumstances. It is, to a large extent, a natural monopoly. In other words, it will cost two stations to operate at a given point twice as much as it will cost one, and yet they will get just the business that one would, and wherever one company gets into a field first it is perhaps not a wise thing for another company to go into that field.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does the gentleman mean within a certain radius of that field?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It has an effect upon the air?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes, considerable; on account of static conditions.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not want to state something that is not correct. The Marconi Co. of England virtually controls the wireless of England.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Not the international.

Mr. EDMONDS. And the Telefunken Co. of Germany controls the wireless in Germany.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am talking about the international radio service.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is the international service. The Marconi Co. of England is the company that communicates with the Marconi Co. of this country. In the testimony it was positively stated that in England the overseas wireless was privately owned.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I do not remember the testimony as the gentleman does.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is true of Germany and also of Italy. I do not know what the fact is in Spain or in France.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I do not care to yield further, but I say that the testimony is to the contrary, as testified to by different individuals. Prior to the time that the Government was put out of the service it had earned $1,500,000, which went into the Public Treasury, and it was testified to, and it is undisputed, that the Government could then and could now render this supplemental service to the public without its costing the Government a single additional dime. It was testified by Admiral Bullard that it is to the advantage of the naval radio system to do it, because we have to keep the men on duty for the Government service anyway, and if they get plenty of work it simply means more efficiency and raises the state of the art.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is it the gentleman's opinion that all of these radio stations should be Government owned and operated?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am not prepared to go that far, but I will say this: I think that it is a natural monopoly, and as has already been suggested here, on account of static conditions, there is a limit to competition, and the Government is compelled to own its own stations in order to handle the Government's business, and as a matter of national defense. We are bound to have these international radio systems, and in view of that fact, and in view of the fact that it is a natural monopoly, it might be well to consider that proposition. However, I do not care to enter into any discussion of that now, because it does not enter into this resolution or the amendment thereto which I shall propose. My position simply stated is this, that we ought not to compel the Government to withdraw its service from the press until it develops that private radio stations are prepared to render that service. I do not think we ought to fix a specific date and say to the Government, "You shall get out then, whether the private companies are able to render the service or not," and this bill does exactly that. It says that they shall get out in any event, on June 30, 1922, whether the private companies are then able to render the service or not.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman is opposed to the limitation?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am opposed to that. I say that the resolution should specify that the naval stations should not be prohibited from rendering that service prior to that date, because everybody concedes that the private companies can not do it prior to then, and that after that time the termination of the Government service ought to depend on whether the private companies have increased their equipment to such an extent that they can render the service. It should also be remembered that as to whether they are then able to render the service, according to the provisions of the bill would be determined by the present Secretary of Commerce, and he is a member of the majority party, who would then have to give notice to the Secretary of the Navy, who is also a member of the dominant party. If the Secretary of Commerce can not determine that to be true, I say that the public and the press, as important as their interests are, ought still to be permitted to get that service, and that the rights of the Government and the rights of the press and the rights of the public should not be subordinated to the selfish interests of a few private radio companies.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say to the gentleman that as he will recall, I do not know whether the remark was made in his presence or not, but the idea of some members of the committee was that if it should transpire that it might become necessary to extend this rate to the press beyond June 30, 1922, the Congress will then be in session and the matter might then be taken care of. However, I will say this, with a slight modification which I think may be acceptable to the gentleman, I think we may agree upon what he suggests.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I hope we may, and I want to say this, that the gentleman from Illinois and I were on the subcommittee together and we have undertaken to thrash this out, and I do not think there has been very much difference between us anywhere along the line. But with regard to the fact that we will be in session and can enact supplemental legislation, the press and the news associations have for 18 months been trying to get relief and have not got it yet, and it is an important matter. It is an important matter to them, it is an important matter to the public that they should not be curtailed in the receipt and transmission of press matter.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the gentleman will yield, his position simply is we should not tie ourselves with the view of untying ourselves by legislation later?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That is it exactly. I want to invoke in support of the position, which I in my feeble way have endeavored to express, what I presume will be considered to be pretty good authority at this time. President Harding in his message to the Congress, in dealing with this subject, said this:

> It is proper to invite your attention to the importance of the radio communication and cable. To meet strategic, commercial, and political needs, active encouragement should be given to the extension of American-owned and operated cable and radio services. Between the United States and its possessions there should be ample communication facilities providing direct services at reasonable rates. Between the United States and other countries not only should there be adequate facilities but these should be so far as practicable direct and free from foreign intermediation. Friendly cooperation should be extended to international efforts aimed at encouraging improvement of international communication facilities and designed to further the exchange of messages.

Now, listen to this:

> Private monopolies tending to prevent the development of needed facilities should be prohibited. Government-owned facilities, wherever possible without unduly interfering with private enterprise or Government needs, should be made available for general usage.

He does not say they should be made available only until June, 1922, and we are certainly not unduly interfering with private business when we say that private business can have all of the radio business whenever they are able to attend to it. The President in this message says further:

> Particularly desirable is the provision of ample cables and radio services at reasonable rates for the transmission of press matter, so that the American reader may receive a wide range of news and the foreign reader receive full accounts of American activities. The daily press of all countries may well be put in position to contribute to international understandings by the publication of interesting foreign news.

Later in his message President Harding makes this statement:

> International communication by cable and radio requires cooperation between the powers concerned.

Now, gentlemen, I say that President Harding in his recent message on this subject was exactly right. He has looked at it from the broad standpoint of the press and the public. Why, if it were to be reduced to a question of dollars and cents, the press business alone has got a thousand dollars invested where these private radio companies have got a dime invested. If you want to disregard the public interests, if you want to disregard absolutely the importance of communication of foreign news, and if it is going to resolve itself in a contest between private interests I think we ought to resolve it in favor of the press agencies and newspapers of the land who have demanded a good deal more than it is proposed to give them in the resolution under consideration unless it is amended, because they asked for the passage of the Greene bill, which fixes no such restrictions upon them. If we had passed the bill introduced by Chairman GREENE in the form in which it was introduced, the press of the country and the Congress would not now be confronted with the situation with which we are now dealing. Now, I want to say further, gentlemen, if anybody objects to the form, which I advocate, and which some of my colleagues advocate, except these privately owned radio companies that seem to be so afraid of Government competition, there is nothing in the world even now, and there has been nothing since February 29, 1920, to keep the private radio companies from getting all the business that they can get and handle. My proposed amendment does not interfere with that. It simply provides that the Government shall supplement the needed service until the privately owned companies are able to render it. The majority of this committee which reported out this bill are opposed to even that except up until June, 1922, unless they, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, see proper to agree to the suggested amendment. Now, here is another feature of this proposition. The question is as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] explained to you. The newspaper representatives advised us that it was impossible for them to make proper foreign news arrangements unless they could do so for some definite period of time. They first asked that this service be extended from year to year, in order that they might make annual contracts. Now, this resolution gives less than one year, because before this bill can become a law they will not have a year—much less, any time whatever—within which to make a yearly contract; and then the Government service is to terminate abruptly regardless of conditions, and could not be reinstated after June 30, 1922, no matter what conditions might subsequently arise.

The amendment that I propose to introduce, gentlemen of the committee, is this, namely, to strike out the language contained on the last page of the bill after the word "thereof" in line 2, and insert in lieu this language:

> And all rights conferred by this section shall terminate and cease in any event on June 30, 1922: Provided further, That the rights conferred by this section with respect to press messages shall not terminate and cease prior to June 30, 1922, after which date the right to use such Government service for the transmission and reception of press messages shall terminate and cease as between any countries or localities or between any locality or privately operated ships, whenever privately owned and operated stations are capable of meeting the normal communication requirements between such countries or localities or between any locality and privately owned ships, and the Secretary of Commerce shall have notified the Secretary of the Navy thereof.

Now, who can object to that except the private companies, who would like to let the public and the press go without the service, looking at it from their own selfish interests and disregarding the public interest? But we are here supposed to regard the public interest, and I think that the public is entitled to this service until they can get it from some other source. Even my amendment will make it more restrictive than in the form of the resolution as originally introduced by the chairman of this committee.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not going to consume any more of your time on this proposition. I think it is a matter of tremendous importance, as President Harding saw proper to say in his message. It is a matter of sufficient importance that we should do what he strongly recommended in that message, and I hope that those of you across the aisle will see proper to join me in following your leader in that respect. [Applause.]

Mr. KEARNS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. KEARNS. To submit a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know how much time is remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] has 20 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] has some time remaining, if he desires to use it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I understand he yielded the floor. Does he wish to yield time?

Mr. KEARNS. We are desirous of transacting some very important business, and we are strongly of the opinion the committee is unanimous for this legislation, and since there is not a quorum I thought possibly we could come to some understanding that we would have an early vote on this.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman would not take advantage of those who are absent by compelling them to come through the hot weather to the House and vote?

Mr. KEARNS. I would not, provided we had an early vote.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. We are going to have an early vote. How much time is there remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has 20 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Tennessee has 17, if he desires to use it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I reserve my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee. I have been a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries ever since the radio act was enacted in 1912, and during all that time the committee have faithfully tried to advance the interests of radio development and have succeeded in taking care of all the demands that have been presented to the committee. During the recent World War it became necessary to turn the radio business over to the Government for the use of the Navy. There were some 5,000 radio operators who were called into the Navy during the war, all of them amateurs, for the purpose of aiding the Navy and assisting in the matters of radio communication. So there has been no attempt, either in the committee or outside of the committee, to prevent the Navy Department from enlarging its radio service or making such improvements as were needed, but many individuals, who as amateurs became very proficient in the use and development of radio, lost all of their opportunity for improvement, and they were not allowed to use their mechanisms during the war period.

After the armistice was declared, and later in 1920, the Navy finally removed the restrictions to which these amateur operators had been subjected and restored to them the opportunity to reestablish themselves and improve radio service. As a consequence they have ameliorated the radio conditions without cost to either the Government or injury to any individual. Now, my friend from Tennessee is very much disturbed because he is afraid that if the Government will only take care of this business and nothing is done to develop radio service on the part of individuals, there is going to be a great damage to the community. I can not agree with the theories of the gentleman from Tennessee. The development of the radio has been very largely through private enterprise, and beyond even what the Navy has done. Now the gentleman from Tennessee states that the Navy has turned a vast amount of money into the Treasury through radio development. They certainly expended a vast amount of money, and if any money was returned to the Treasury I am sure all will feel gratified. I can not conceive any reason why the Government should come in with its vast resources and interfere with an individual or an organization that is trying to build up an industry and establish it. And many individuals have established themselves in radio development. I know of a man in my own city, who lives only about 100 feet from where I reside, that is able to communicate with the Hawaiian Islands, and he communicates at a time that does not interfere with anybody else, because on the top of his letterhead it states that his operations will be conducted between 11 o'clock at night and 1 o'clock in the morning. And he communicates with people as he pleases and communicates with such people as are interested in the private development of radio. I am in favor of such development. I am glad to hear the gentleman indorse the action of the President of the United States, and I think he and I are in perfect accord regarding the President's actions. But I do not believe in the Government establishing itself in private business and preventing the people of the United States, from whatever part of the country they come, from developing any business that they see fit to develop. I think we ought to develop it, and I think the Government ought to cease their efforts to compete to the injury and destruction of private enterprise. And this development of radio by the Navy Department is from funds paid from the Treasury. The cost of the maintenance of the radio service in the Navy, the cost of the improvements of the service in the Navy is paid out of the pockets of the people of the United States in the form of increased taxation. But if the individual desires to develop radio and the Department of Commerce decides that there is sufficient private enterprise to meet all the needs of the community, I believe in having it done by private enterprise and private investment of capital rather than to grind the taxpayers to pay the price, and then have it claimed on this floor that it does not cost anything to do the business and that all receipts are profits from the business, when no estimate is submitted to show the overhead charges or other necessary expenses of maintenance of the departments while they deliberately attempt to prevent the success of private enterprise.

I know the Navy Department can not be carried on without cost. It costs a great deal of money. I am willing to appropriate all the money needed to keep the Navy in good condition to meet any of its legitimate expenses, but I am opposed to appropriating money to enable it to destroy or interfere with private enterprise. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1920, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, under the terms and conditions and at rates prescribed by him, which rates shall be just and reasonable, and which, upon complaint, shall be subject to review and revision by the Interstate Commerce Commission, to use all radio stations and apparatus, wherever located, owned by the United States and under the control of the Navy Department—(a) for the reception and transmission of press messages offered by any newspaper published in the United States, its Territories or possessions, or published by citizens of the United States in foreign countries, or by any press association of the United States, and—(b) for the reception and transmission of private commercial messages: Provided, That the rates fixed for the reception and transmission of all such messages, other than press messages between the Pacific coast of the United States and the Orient, shall not be less than the rates charged by privately owned and operated stations for like messages and service: Provided further, That the right to use such stations for any of the purposes named in this section, except for the reception and transmission of press messages, other than press messages between the Atlantic coast of the United States and ships at sea, shall terminate and cease as between any countries or localities or between any locality and privately operated ships, whenever privately owned and operated stations are capable of meeting the normal communication requirements between such countries or localities or between any locality and privately operated ships, and the Secretary of Commerce shall have notified the Secretary of the Navy thereof, and all rights conferred by this section shall terminate and cease in any event two years from the date this resolution takes effect.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 3, line 4, after the word "event," strike out the words "two years from the date this resolution takes effect" and insert in lieu thereof "on June 30, 1922."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment in the form of a substitute for the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 2, after the word "thereof," strike out the comma and the following words, "and all rights conferred by this section shall terminate and cease in any event on June 30, 1922," and insert in lieu thereof a colon and the following:

"Provided further, That the rights conferred by this section with respect to press messages shall not terminate and cease prior to June 30, 1922, after which date the right to use such Government service for the transmission and reception of press messages shall terminate and cease as between any countries or localities or between any locality or privately operated ships, whenever privately owned and operated stations are capable of meeting the normal communication requirements between such countries or localities or between any locality and privately owned ships, and the Secretary of Commerce shall have notified the Secretary of the Navy thereof."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not a substitute to the committee amendment. It would be in order, I take it, when the committee amendment is disposed of. But the amendment proposed by the gentleman has no direct relevancy to the committee amendment which is before the House; that is, to strike out "two years from the date this resolution takes effect" and insert "on June 30, 1922." There may be Members of the House who would favor the committee amendment and yet who would also wish to favor the proposed substitute.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that the proposed substitute strikes out of the original bill other matter than the committee amendment, and therefore it can not be a substitute for the committee amendment. It strikes out all the language beginning in line 2 after the comma on page 3.

Mr. STAFFORD. My further point of order is that the substitute is not germane to the committee amendment.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Would it be in order if the committee amendment is voted on, then to offer the proposed substitute as an amendment to the bill as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. Any amendment otherwise germane would be in order and proper.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. What I was asking was if the committee should adopt the committee amendment would it still be in order to offer the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee to the section?

UMI

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if it did not by its very terms reverse the action of the committee in agreeing to its amendment—that is, unless it was an amendment inconsistent with the action which the committee had already taken.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The amendment of the committee does not affect the meaning of any part of the bill as it was written except the time when it goes into effect, and therefore it seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee would not necessarily contravene the amendment of the committee. But I would like to know what the Chair thinks about it, because there ought to be some way for the House to express itself on the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The only way that the House could express itself would be to vote down the committee amendment.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not understand the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House could vote down the committee amendment and then take action not inconsistent with the vote by which the committee amendment was voted down.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Voting down the committee amendment in this case would not improve the situation, because if you voted down the committee amendment you would still have the limitation, and the question would again arise whether the proposed amendment would affect the limitation. I think even after the limitation had been adopted an exception to that limitation might not necessarily be in contravention to the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If the Chair please, of course I fully understand that if the committee amendment were adopted it would be proper for me to offer an amendment to strike out the words "on June 30, 1922," instead of the words that the committee amendment proposes to strike out. But having acted on that, it occurs to me that my amendment could be directed to the bill as reported.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Unless the committee amendment should be considered as a perfecting amendment; then the whole thing would be subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that his amendment might be submitted at some other point in the bill rather than at the point where the amendment has been recommended.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If the Chair please, my amendment is in the form of a proviso. I will state that, of course, I have no objection to the committee amendment being voted on first, and I was rather under the impression that the committee amendment was a perfecting amendment, because it dealt only with the matter of time, whereas my amendment deals with the entire proviso.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman not realize that that is the reason why it is not a substitute?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Would it be in order to offer it as an amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not in the chair, but it is my opinion that it would be.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, instead of offering my amendment in the form of a substitute, I simply offer mine as an amendment to the amendment offered by the committee to the proviso.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a suggestion? Let us have a vote on the committee amendment, and then, I take it, it will be in order for the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am perfectly willing to do that, unless the point be made and sustained that my amendment is not in order because it is contrary to the action just taken.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I shall not make any point of order against the gentleman's amendment myself, but I want to offer a substitute for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the committee amendment should be disposed of first.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Without impairing my right to offer the other?

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman can offer any germane amendment that is not inconsistent with the action of the committee in agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me suggest to the Chair, in order that we can get down to business on this matter, that the parliamentary status is that a point of order is pending against the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee. Let the Chair dispose of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] is not in its very nature a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would it not be possible and proper by unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; by unanimous consent, always.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That can be done always.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the amendment which is at the Clerk's desk, except that it will be necessary to change it——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee take his amendment and re-form it so that it will be in the proper form?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. I desire to move an amendment, to strike out everything contained in the joint resolution beginning with the word "provided," in line 11, page 2. Is not that motion preferential to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BLANTON. He has not offered it yet. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. LONDON. Then I move to strike out everything beginning with the word "provided," on page 2, line 11.

The CHAIRMAN. To strike out the remainder of the section?

Mr. LONDON. To strike out the remainder of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] has a preferential motion. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 3, line 2, after the word "thereof," strike out the comma and the following words: "and all rights conferred by this section shall terminate and cease in any event on June 30, 1922," and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon and the following:

"Provided further, That the rights conferred by this section with respect to press messages shall not terminate and cease prior to June 30, 1922, after which date the right to use such Government service for the transmission and reception of press messages shall terminate and cease as between any countries or localities or between any locality or privately operated ships, whenever privately owned and operated stations are capable of meeting the normal communication requirements between such countries or localities or between any locality and privately owned ships, and the Secretary of Commerce shall have notified the Secretary of the Navy thereof."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHINDBLOM as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: Page 3, line 5, after the words "June 30, 1922," in the committee amendment, insert the following: "Provided, That after June 30, 1922, the right to use such Government service for the transmission and reception of press messages shall terminate and cease as between any countries or localities or between any locality or privately operated ships whenever privately owned and operated stations are capable of meeting the normal communication requirements between such countries or localities or between any locality and privately owned ships, and the Secretary of Commerce shall have notified the Secretary of the Navy thereof."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I have this objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee: He strikes out the words, beginning in line 2, on page 3, of the joint resolution reading as follows:

And all rights conferred by this section shall cease and terminate in any event on June 30, 1922.

I think those words should remain. I am not opposed to granting the further privilege to press messages and press associations in the event the Secretary of Commerce believes that it is necessary to use the facilities of the Navy for the transmission of press messages after June 30, 1922, and that this may be done is the only effect of my substitute.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. Does not the gentleman's substitute go much further than the bill as originally reported by the committee in that it extends the time provided for by the law as it exists to-day?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. To what time does the gentleman refer?

Mr. MILLS. June 5, 1922.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It has already been extended 25 days. That is all, and that has already been done by the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MILLS. I understand that; and now the gentleman is extending the time during which the Government can handle commercial business.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not commercial business—press messages.

Mr. MILLS. Well, press messages are commercial business.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Under my substitute, after June 30, 1922, the radio facilities of the Navy may be used for the transmission and reception of press messages until the Secretary of Commerce shall have determined that private radio facilities are adequate, and then it will terminate, when he notifies the Secretary of the Navy of that fact.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard in opposition to the substitute and the amendment. My understanding of the situation is that after lengthy hearings and much consideration Congress fixed June, 1922, as the limit of time during which the Government-owned radio stations would accept commercial business, whether furnished by the press or in the form of ordinary commercial messages. My understanding further is that in reporting this bill it was intended by the committee that the limit should be observed not only as to commercial business but as to press messages. An important principle is involved and the amendment reaches much further than appears on the surface. To-day two or three corporations of considerable importance are investing vast amounts of capital in the development and operation of radio facilities in this country. It is impossible for them to obtain the necessary capital to carry on this work of development unless they have some assurance that the Government of the United States will not continue in the radio business. Now, gentlemen will urge that it is merely an extension with relation to press messages, but at the same time if I was in the radio business I should look on this as an entering wedge and a determination on the part of the people who believe that the Government should remain in the business to retain a foothold in the radio business, and if that is the effect I assure you, gentlemen, it will have a serious effect on the development of the private industry. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS. With pleasure.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is the gentleman unwilling to trust his own Secretary of Commerce to declare when there are facilities to meet the demands of the public and the press in the radio business?

Mr. MILLS. Now that the Government has declared that it will go out of the radio business in 1922, I am opposed to having it change its mind.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then the gentleman is unwilling to trust his own Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, we are willing to accept the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were 23 ayes and 44 noes.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: On page 2, line 11, after the word "messages," strike out the colon, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, this resolution prohibits the Government from supplying radio service at rates cheaper than the rates charged by private companies. It is calculated to secure to private capital the control of the air. Organized capital has acquired a great deal of the land, has control of the ocean, and this resolution intends to make it certain that the air shall not escape from the dominion of the king—private capital. Some day we will have the sun harnessed, and private corporations will be formed which will levy a tax upon the people for each ray of sunshine. It should be clear, except to those who do not want to see, that the use of the wireless and the control of the air can not be safely intrusted to private capital.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Does the gentleman contend that the sun can be controlled by Government?

Mr. LONDON. I contend that land, which is a public utility, is now controlled by private capital, because it has managed to make laws which enable a small portion of the people to control the land. If the genius of man could discover a method for controlling the sun, we would hear arguments that private genius and private capital should be permitted to exploit the sun and sunshine.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. In a minute. In view of the fact that in most countries of the world radio stations are controlled by the Governments, it will be necessary for private capital to enter into arrangements with foreign Governments. We will thus have private capital undertake the functions of government in the sphere of radio control. The private radio companies are not helpless little private enterprises, but represent, as the hearings disclose, some of the most gigantic corporations in America. It is not a question of encouraging private capital; it is a question of surrendering to private capital.

Of course I realize that the Republicans are trying to carry out the promise they made that they will have less government in business and more business in government, but I think they are carrying it a little too far, and that they are permitting business to govern altogether too much. You are permitting business to rule, to control, and to govern.

Mr. BLANTON. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in favor of a government competing with private individuals in business enterprises?

Mr. LONDON. You are doing something more than that here; you are preventing the Government from competing. That is what you are doing; when you stipulate that the charge of the Government shall not be less than that of private capital you are preventing the Government from competing in the business. That may be democracy in Texas, but it is not democracy anywhere else.

Mr. BLANTON. Democracy in Texas is taking the Government out of business.

Mr. LONDON. Democracy in Texas does not want to put business in a position where it can control the life of the people, and that is what you are doing.

You permit private capital to control public functions and public necessities.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Can the gentleman cite a single instance in history where the Government has developed a single convenience of progress for man?

Mr. LONDON. In the half a minute I have, I should say, take your public schools, for one thing.

Mr. BEGG. Did the Government do that?

Mr. LONDON. Exactly, and Herbert Spencer, the great philosopher of unrestrained individualism and an authority relied on by anarchists, argued that the establishment of the public schools was the worst menace to liberty. There is no difference between the reactionary capitalist at the top and the anarchist at the bottom. Both of them abhor every form of government. Both of them detest the subordination of the individual to public welfare.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think it necessary to rise in opposition to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], because I assume this committee will not take seriously the purpose which it has in mind, to wit, to take the life and strength out of this proposition. I rise merely for the purpose of saying that there should be no confusion whatever as to the purposes of this resolution. In brief, they are simply these: The Government, during the war, through the Navy Department, acquired certain radio stations, which it still owns and operates. According to the evidence before the committee, it has been shown that private radio institutions in some cases do not possess adequate facilities to furnish accommodations to the public, and especially to the press associations of the country. All this resolution does, and all the committee had in mind that it would do, is simply to provide that when the Secretary of Commerce finds that private concerns do not have facilities to do all of this press business, then the Navy stations shall, until the 30th of June, 1922, be permitted to carry the excess that is offered. That is all there is in the resolution, and that is all that is sought to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

UMI

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The committee has one more bill for consideration. Is it necessary that the committee rise now and report this resolution, or may it be laid aside with the favorable recommendation and the other bill taken up?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the committee should rise and report this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House joint resolution No. 7 and had instructed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution as amended.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 14, noes 61.

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it in order to explain the reason why I voted against adjournment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If I were permitted to explain, I would say that I voted against it so as to expedite the tariff bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2089. An act authorizing the appointment of an additional judge for the district of Minnesota; and

S. J. Res. 72. Joint resolution for the relief of States in the cotton belt that have given aid to cotton farmers forced from the fields in established nonproduction zones through efforts to eradicate the pink bollworm.

FISH-RESCUE STATION, MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 2393, to provide for the establishment on the Mississippi River of a fish-rescue station, to be under the direction of the Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the bill H. R. 2393. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2393, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established on the Mississippi River, at a point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce, a station for the rescue of fishes and the propagation of mussels in connection with fish-rescue operations throughout the Mississippi Valley, to be under the direction of the Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce, and for this purpose there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $75,000 for the construction of buildings and the purchase of equipment, boats, and such other accessories as may be deemed necessary for the successful operation of such station.

SEC. 2. That in connection with the establishment of such fish-rescue station there is authorized the following personnel, namely: One district supervisor, at $3,000 per annum, to have general charge of fish-rescue and fish-cultural operations in the Mississippi Valley; a field superintendent, at $2,400 per annum; 2 field foremen, at $1,500 each per annum; 5 fish-culturists at large, at $1,200 each per annum; 1 engineer at large, at $1,400 per annum; 1 clerk, at $1,200 per annum; 2 coxswains at large, at $1,200 each per annum; and 2 apprentice fish-culturists, at $900 each per annum.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, in view of the uneasiness which seems to exist in the House, I shall make only a very brief and general statement in the first instance, and will then be glad to yield to answer such questions as I may be able to. This bill is identical in purpose and substantially the same in language as the bill introduced in the last House by Mr. Esch, of Wisconsin. The bill at that time was favorably reported by the committee, but failed to be reached for consideration. It has two primary purposes. It authorizes the establishment of a fish-rescue station on the Mississippi River at a point to be designated by the Secretary of Commerce for the purpose of carrying on there in an enlarged way the fish-rescue operations of the Bureau of Fisheries.

Its second purpose is to aid in the propagation of the mussels in the Mississippi River. The Mississippi River offers a most unusual opportunity for fish rescue operations. It is a river where there are rapid rises of the waters and where there are corresponding rapid recession of waters. These rapid changes of elevation of waters leave where the waters drop a great many ponds, puddles, bayous, and even lakes at various places up and down the length of the river, and every time these periods of drought or recession of waters comes there are left in these ponds or puddles or pools, whatever you choose to call them, large quantities of valuable edible fish. These instances occur not only in the upper regions of the river, in Minnesota and Wisconsin, but to a greater or less extent clear down the whole course of the Mississippi River to Louisiana and its mouth. The bureau in a small way has been at work along this line for some few years. I think as far back as 1914 the department rescued from these ponds something like two and a half million fish. If the fish are not rescued with the receding of the waters and the drying up of the pools and the ponds, the fish die, and again if they are there when cold weather comes the small ponds freeze over and the fishes suffocate. The work from 1914 on has extended until in 1919 it has resulted in the rescue in round numbers of 156,000,000 of edible fish from these pools and streams.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. May I finish this brief statement, and then I will gladly yield? Now, it has been estimated that at least 25 per cent of those rescued fish which are put back into the main current of the stream and into the main stream live to maturity, and it has been estimated that at the going value of fish that number of fish in 1919 was worth at least six and a half million dollars. This work was done by the Department of Commerce at an average cost per thousand of fish at 20 cents.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That is the question I wanted to ask.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. The average cost is 20 cents per 1,000 of these rescued fish. Now, in the doing of this work the department has operated by calling upon the existing cultural stations up and down the Mississippi River for men. That is all done at the expense of existing activities. And this fish rescue station is designed to be established at some point to be designated by the authorities of the bureau, from which point the employees herein authorized can operate and take charge of this work all up and down the length of the valley. Now, that is the first proposition, I may say the primary purpose, in this bill. Closely connected with that there is another activity which should receive encouragement. There is in the Mississippi Valley a very considerable button industry. As I understand it, there are something like 20,000 employees employed throughout this valley in this button industry, and the production amounts annually to a great many million dollars. Now, these mussels are facing extinction. At certain seasons of the year the mussels throw off the young. If fish are not present at the time these young are thrown off the young mussels sink to the bottom of the stream and die. In other words, in order for these young mussels to live it is necessary as they are thrown off from the parent mussel that they attach themselves to the gills, the fins, or the tails of fishes, and there they embed themselves, and there they stay until finally at the proper period of development they leave the fish and take up their independent life in the bed of the river.

Now, in connection with these fish-rescue operations it has been the practice of the bureau to fill the ponds, the intermediate ponds in which these fish are kept from the time they are rescued from the waste waters until they are put back into the native waters, with spawning mussels, the young of which attach themselves to the fish put into the ponds with them. It is a curious thing, but the scientists tell us that a certain kind of mussel attaches itself to a certain kind of fish and will not attach itself to another species of fish. So the bureau in a small way has been introducing these rescued fish into these ponds filled with these spawning mussels and then the fish inoculate themselves with these young mussels and the mussels stay there until the proper time. Then the fish are put into the waters of the river and these young mussels drop off and the mussel takes up its independent life in the waters of the river. Now, it seems to the committee which has this bill in charge that either one of these activities justified this authorization, and so the bill has been reported here with the unanimous report from the committee. Now, that is all I care to say, unless somebody desires to ask a question. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield me a minute?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] has said, in addition to the great number that are put into the river, the fish that are rescued are distributed upon application to various parts of the country. Along the front of my district on the outside of the levee, when the river goes down the ponds and what we call borrow pits, where the earth has been taken for the purpose of building a levee, fish gather in tens of thousands—I dare say in the millions—and they are rescued from those places and shipped under the direction of the Bureau of Fisheries to all parts of the country adjacent to the Mississippi River. This work has been going on in a more or less haphazard way for a number of years with the very limited funds which have been made available for it, and the work has been fully justified by results. This bill ought to be passed, and I hope it will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. We are not going to take much time, and I ask to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not see anyone on his feet asking to be recognized.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I had reserved the balance of my time. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. A. P. NELSON].

Mr. A. P. NELSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very grateful to the chairman of the committee for the privilege of speaking out of order. I desire to address myself during the time allotted me to the subject of limitation of armaments.

Mr. Chairman, it is my profound conviction that one of the greatest and most far-reaching problems of the hour is the problem of an agreement among the great powers of the world to initiate a proper program of reduction in armaments, both military and naval. An agreement of this kind is absolutely demanded by the serious economic conditions which exist to-day in every one of the great world powers.

It is quite evident that if the present competitive program of increased armaments, both military and naval, by the great powers of the world is to be continued, there can be nothing left but world bankruptcy and dissolution of civilization. At the first meeting of The Hague tribunal, Czar Nicholas of Russia is reported to have stated that Europe at that time was spending £250,000,000 per annum for armaments, and to have indicated that if Europe were long to continue armament at such a rate it would eventually spell chaos and ruin industrially and socially to all of Europe. If this were true, then, of Europe, what is the problem to-day, when America alone is approximating that expenditure for armaments? As a result of the awful desolation of the World War and our continued program of huge armaments, the world is staggering under a load of enormous debts and almost unbearable tax burdens. Even our own country, the wealthiest Nation in the world, is facing to-day a taxation program that is well-nigh intolerable. Debts and taxes must be reduced. Extravagance must be removed and economy must be established. Our overburdened and discouraged citizenship is joining the embittered cry of the world for relief. They demand that the wanton waste in maintaining large military and naval establishments be eliminated. [Applause.]

I stand for an adequate navy and an adequate army; but no one can successfully contend that at the present time there is any good and sane reason for increased navies and enlarged armies.

The world is now practically prostrate and almost bankrupt from the recent war, and no extensive war conflict can, by even the wildest flights of the imagination, be thought possible for the next 10 years. If that is true, why, then, build battleships that will be on the scrap heap in 10 years and of little avail in active conflict at the end of that time? For the present time our able-bodied and valiant veterans of the World War are our potential army of protection against any immediate emergency. I am agreed, however, to expand our research bureaus in both the Army and the Navy. Keep these up to the last minute of details in all lines of military and naval inventions and discoveries. It is clear that the world powers must cease the insane and ruinous program of appropriating for huge naval and military establishments and use their tax budgets for peaceful and constructive purposes. [Applause.]

Now is the hour to initiate such a world movement and, as our President has indicated, we are ready to cooperate in such a movement. This should not be a matter of petty politics but a matter of the united action of the deepest patriotism and the broadest statesmanship for the welfare of struggling, bleeding, and suffering humanity.

May our good President and a united Congress lead the way for a conference of the world powers on reduction of armaments at the earliest possible date. I plead for such a conference both from an economic and ethical standpoint. May we have the vision to see and the statesmanship to lead in bringing about at no distant date the proper solution of this burning question of humanity. The only way to do a thing is to do it. Let us cease merely debating and talking about it. Let us highly resolve to move forward to the shining goal set before us and by united action help secure world disarmament and insure the fruits of universal peace and world-wide prosperity to a distressed and war-torn humanity. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall occupy 10 minutes. In fact, I think I shall not. It may be somewhat of a passage from the sublime to the ridiculous for me to pass from the topic of world interest that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] has been discussing and talk about the measure that is before the House. But that is what I propose to do.

My attention was called to this measure in the last Congress, the last time it was up. I did not know it was to come up to-day until I came into the House this afternoon. This is a very worthy bill, gentlemen, and it has a lot in it that is of interest to our people. I do not believe that you gentlemen who live in other parts of the country know the vast extent of the riches that are contained in the Mississippi River in a food way. The quantities of fish that are taken out of the Mississippi River and its tributaries and sold in the markets of the world reach an enormous figure. I would not attempt to state it now, but carload after carload of fish is daily shipped out of almost every town of any considerable size along the Mississippi River, all valuable food fishes.

Within the last few years most of the land has been leveed along the Mississippi River. As a consequence all up and down the Mississippi River are found innumerable barrow pits. When the river rises in the springtime these barrow pits fill with water containing fish, most of which are edible. When the water drops, as it usually does, quite suddenly, we find these barrow pits full of the most valuable kinds of fish.

During the last season I have observed that the Fisheries representatives of the United States Government and of the various States which have been engaged in this rescue work have done a very valuable service. In the first place, they have driven out the pot fisherman who goes through there with his nets shortly after the fall of the river and gets out of the pools almost everything that is living in them and destroys the little fishes. They have driven the pot fisherman out of business because the United States agents and State agents are on the job. But in addition they have saved these vast quantities of fish alive which every year before had been dying. I have known the situation to be such that in the spring of the year you could not endure the stench of decaying fish for a long distance from the river, occasioned by the vast quantities of dead fish lying along the river in these ponds and pools, representing many tons of fish in the aggregate, which have been destroyed in that way by the sudden fall of the river.

Now, in the last year these representatives, with their boats and seines, have been going up and down the river and taking these fish out of the barrow pits, and the result of it is that the fish life of the river has been largely increased, and all of it practically is now being saved.

This is a valuable work. I am sorry that there is not a greater authorization of appropriations made for it in this bill than there is. I hope in the future it will be the policy of this committee to bring in further authorizations for further stations of this kind, so that these fish may have the protection that they ought to have, and the food supply of the country be thereby conserved and increased.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman knows that it is particularly valuable at this time on account of the mussel fishery up there being pretty well depleted.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes. I think some of the greatest mussel beds in the Mississippi River were along that reach of the river that borders the western part of my district. I remember one mussel bed near the city of New Boston, in my own county, that was many feet deep. Those mussels had accumulated there from year to year. The mussel, you must understand, is not like the oyster. The oyster does not move. But these mussels and clams move about in the river, and these vast shoals that they would form would move. When it was found out that the mussel shells were good for something the fishermen began to take them out, scooping them out by means of all sorts of devices; and, as has been the custom with respect to our national resources from time immemorial, they would destroy more than they would save. They would take them out, large and small alike, and destroy everything that was there; and in consequence in two or three years' time those vast beds of mussels that had been formed, many feet in depth, disappeared from our river. To-day you can not find them.

Many of the mussel shells that are used in the button factories in my district are brought up from Arkansas and Tennessee and other States to keep the factories going, and the only mussels that we find are those that we get by dragging hooks through the water; the mussels being open, upon the hooks entering the shells they will cling to the hook and the mussel gatherer will bring them up a dozen or so at one drag, and then proceed to drag again; but in the places where there were once thousands there are now only a few.

The amount of potential wealth represented by those things is unimaginable. These fish that I have told you of are the carriers of them. It may be a matter of interest to you, gentlemen, to know that the common garfish, that nobody ever thought amounted to anything on earth and which is very plentiful in the Mississippi River, is one of the best carriers of mussels that exists, and, as far as I can see, gentlemen, that fact is the only redeeming reason for the existence of the garfish. The fish is a nuisance in all other respects, but the fish culturists in our country have been gathering them in by the thousands and turning them loose inoculated with mussel spawn, for the dissemination of these mussels. And that carries out the idea that everything in creation is of some use at some time, and that seems to be the use of the garfish.

Those mussels will never be back in our streams in the quantities in which they once existed there, because of our profligacy with that source of our national wealth, but I hope that before many years there will be established in the river not only a chain of fish-rescue stations but enough fish and mussel culture stations to restock the river and take care of all the fish in the ponds and pools and to see to it that the mussels in the Mississippi River are reestablished to some extent. Proper laws ought to be enacted as to the taking of them, and those laws should be made uniform throughout the Mississippi River States, so that we may to some extent bring back the industry, which has largely vanished from our country.

This bill is a good bill, gentlemen. I hope there may be more like it. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the minority is entitled to an hour.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman means the opposition is entitled to an hour.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of this bill is to conserve the food supply of the country. We have been preaching food conservation for the last five years, and more particularly throughout the war; but we have been allowing a vast quantity of fish to go to waste by reason of not taking proper care to rescue them. I think a compliment ought to be paid to the Bureau of Fisheries by stating that they have been carrying on this fish-rescue work without any special appropriation for that purpose. As I understand it, they have found their only means for doing this work out of the savings that they have effected in the sums appropriated for the propagation of fish. When we consider that the number of fish rescued from the overflows of the Mississippi River amounted to 157,000,000 in just one year, the value of the work can readily be realized; especially when we contemplate that the number propagated by the Government annually at all the regular fish-cultural stations amounts to far less.

We spend a great deal of money constantly for the propagation of fishes, and I want to say that I think we spend it wisely, too. Letters come to my office constantly containing requests for fish propagated in the hatcheries of the Bureau of Fisheries, and a very large number have been put into the public inland waters of my State, as I am sure is true with respect to practically every State in this Union. Not only that, but this Government bureau has endeavored to bring to the attention of the people and popularize many edible fishes with which a great many people have heretofore not been acquainted.

One of the handicaps encountered by the Bureau of Fisheries is that it has not had enough money for experimental work. Some of the experimentation which has been done was not carried far enough to determine whether or not, or how, certain fish, for instance, like the grayfish, could be successfully canned and utilized in that way. I remember it was called to the attention of the House in the last session of Congress that the experiments of the Bureau of Fisheries with that fish had not been altogether successful. At least, the formulas which had been suggested for canning this fish had not resulted in success when tried by private canning industries. While it may be true that in certain instances the bureau has not been able to carry forward its experiments as far and as successfully as it would have liked to do, it remains a fact that it has done a tremendously fine work, which has saved the people of the United States an enormous amount of food that otherwise would have been completely lost to the people. It is an astonishing thing, moreover, that the cost of this rescue work is so much lower than the cost of the propagation of fish. The rescue work has been carried on at an exceedingly low cost; and when once the equipment is provided the maintenance of the work will not, I understand, exceed $15,000 a year.

While speaking of the subject of the conservation of our fish, I think it appropriate to call attention to the fact that Secretary Hoover has been so much impressed recently with the necessity for the proper conservation of our great fish industry, not only in inland waters but even more particularly in the coast waters, that he has been holding here in Washington a series of conferences, to which have been invited those who are interested in fisheries and in fish production in all parts of the United States. Particular attention has been called to the new menace to the fish industry in the coastal waters, especially in those of Virginia and Maryland, through the dissemination of oil and oil waste from ships. This oil-waste nuisance constitutes not only a danger to fish, but is a great fire menace and hazard to both ships and docks in the harbors of the United States. It should be legislated against without delay for it is generally believed it will be stopped when ships are compelled to clean their oil tanks at sea.

In my own locality there are very alarming signs of diminution of the fish supply, and, in fact, all along the coast of Texas. A Government salt-water hatchery is badly needed there. Where fishermen used to catch fish in the largest numbers they are now having difficulty in getting an adequate supply along many parts of that coast. It has been necessary to seek the waters off the coast of Yucatan where large quantities of red snapper and other fish are caught; but it seems to me that the Government of the United States could and should also be conserving and developing the fishing industry in its own waters, which with a little care will yield millions upon millions of pounds of fish and millions of dollars of revenue to the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I wish to add my indorsement to this bill. I think it is a matter of very great importance. While, of course, it involves some expense, yet it is quite apparent that the expenditure in this work will be returned many hundredfold. For instance, it was testified to by the Commissioner of Fisheries before our committee that during 1919 the cost of rescue work was only 20 cents per thousand fish, and, of course, that is an insignificant sum. They are engaged in this rescue work already, and this bill simply enables them to increase and expand that very important work. It increases our food supply, and it is a function which will not be performed unless it is performed by the Government. It is a work in which private enterprise would not engage at all unless it should be to take the stranded fish and sell them for food immediately instead of replacing them in proper places so as to replenish and increase the fish production in those localities. However, as the matter has been so fully covered by my colleagues, and as there seems to be no opposition to the bill, I do not care to do more than to express my hearty indorsement of this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall take only a few minutes of the time allotted to me. I am in favor of this bill. If I were not in favor of it, the eloquent presentation of the facts by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE] would have convinced me that it is a good bill and ought to pass.

But I desire to refer to another matter, and that is the other eloquent speech made on the floor a moment ago by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. A. P. NELSON]. When he was speaking so eloquently for disarmament I was in the attitude of applause and was indorsing all he said. He showed us so conclusively that it is foolishness for our Nation to keep on spending millions of dollars on useless battleships that in a few years will be obsolete. If I was one of his constituents and he should come before me in his district and make that kind of a statement I would say, "Bully for you, Congressman; but how did you vote last time it came up?" You talk eloquently for disarmament and you say we ought to stop building these useless battleships——

Mr. A. P. NELSON. And I voted the same way.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, let us see. On the 14th of last February I made a motion to recommit the naval bill and to strike out of it $83,000,000 that was sought to be expended in new construction of useless battleships. Let us see how the distinguished gentleman voted. There were 9 yeas, and they are easily read—just 9 men out of all you colleagues who daily preach disarmament in the House, but when the crucial test came to vote for disarmament, only 9 would stand up and vote like they preached. You will find the record vote on page 3166 of the RECORD of February 14, 1921. Of course, I was one, having made the motion, and Mr. Clark of Missouri, the great minority leader, was another, and let me say that that was the last record vote he cast in this House. It was a vote for disarmament. It was a vote to save $83,000,000 that was to be expended uselessly out of the Treasury. Let us see who the rest were. Mr. GOODYKOONTZ, and, thank God, he is another who votes like he preaches. He had just made an eloquent speech for disarmament, and when the crucial time came he voted like he preached. Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. JONES of Texas, Mr. KELLER, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. QUIN, and Mr. Sherwood were the nine, but the name of the gentleman from Wisconsin is not written where it ought to be in accordance with his eloquent speeches. Do you know how you are going to bring about disarmament? There is just one way, and that is to disarm. There is just one way to disarm and that is to quit voting $90,000,000 out of the Treasury every year for new construction of battleships, which, according to the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin, are in a few years to become obsolete.

I hated to interfere with such an eloquent speech as the gentleman from Wisconsin was making, but I asked the gentleman not to make that eloquent speech to us here—just a little bunch here that has nothing to do with the naval bill in conference, but to make his speech to the conferees on the naval bill who have control of framing that legislation now. I was hoping that he had been able to bring the power of his eloquence to bear on the conferees so that they would take that $90,000,000 out of the naval bill, and he said no, he had not done it. There is where he ought to have made his speech.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I would like to ask the gentleman if the conference committee will listen to speeches by Members?

Mr. BLANTON. If they do not listen to their colleagues, they ought to be turned off and new conferees appointed. You know what conferees are for; they are to carry out the wishes of the membership of this House, and if the conferees do not pay any attention to what their colleagues say we ought to get rid of them and put in new conferees.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How many times has the gentleman from Texas appeared and made speeches to the conferees?

Mr. BLANTON. Do you know that I see them on the street and I buttonhole them in the corridors. I go to that great leader of ours, JOHN GARNER, who knows more about legislation than your whole Republican side put together, except JOE WALSH, and I say, "For God's sake do so-and-so," and when he does not do that way then I say, "John, you are no good."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How many times has the gentleman from Texas appeared before the conferees and asked to make a speech? Will he please answer the question?

Mr. BLANTON. I will answer it; sit down. [Laughter.] There is just one time to get action on a motion to recommit, which is the psychological time. And if you do not make the motion to recommit at that particular psychological second you are kept from it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman answer?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am not going to yield further. I will answer it if the gentleman will sit down. It will be clear to everybody else if it is not to him. The psychological time is after the third reading of the bill; the minute the Clerk gets through reading the bill the third time if you do not get up and offer a motion to recommit you can not make it. That is the psychological time to put the House on record, not by its speeches but by its vote, whether it wants to disarm and save $90,000,000. I had my motion to recommit ready on the 14th of February, 1921, and got recognition from the Speaker at the proper second, and I made it and forced a record vote in the House, and eight men only besides myself voted like they preached.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WALSH) having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2393) to provide for the establishment on the Mississippi River of a fish-rescue station, and had directed him to report the same back without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill be passed.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demande by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 53, noes 5.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, on that vote I make a point of no quorum.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, if the House adjourns now, will the vote on this bill be the first thing to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it will, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman withhold his point of no quorum for the gentleman from Alabama to make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. WINGO. I will withdraw the point temporarily.

FUNERAL SERVICES OF THE LATE CORPL. BYRAM AND CAPT. JORDAN.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand an invitation from the Rainbow Division Veterans, District of Columbia Chapter, to the House of Representatives, which I ask unanimous consent may be read at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to have read at this time an invitation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUNE 22, 1921.

To the Members of the House of Representatives:

The Rainbow Division Veterans, District of Columbia Chapter, invites the attendance of Members of Congress to the funeral services in the Arlington National Cemetery on Thursday, June 23, 1921, at 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon, of the late Corpl. Carroll Byram, of the One hundred and seventeenth Engineer Train (California company of same), Forty-second Division, and of the late Capt. Mortimer H. Jordan, of the One hundred and sixty-seventh (old Fourth Alabama) Infantry, Company K, Forty-second Division. Both comrades made the supreme sacrifice overseas.

Respectfully,

J. BENTLEY MULFORD,
District of Columbia Chapter
Rainbow Division Veterans, Northbrook Courts.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LAYTON, for eight days, on account of important business.

DAM ACROSS WABASH RIVER, HUNTINGTON, IND.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6814) to authorize the construction of a dam across the Wabash River at Huntington, Ind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of H. R. 6814. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection so long as the parliamentary status is retained on the question on which the House was dividing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. KRAUS. It is. It involves the granting of a right to build a dam for a municipal utility owned by a municipality. It is important that this work be commenced at once during the summer season.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Arkansas that the House divided on the passage of the bill that was under consideration, that the result was announced, those in favor and those opposed, but the Chair did not announce that the bill was passed because the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] made the point of order that there was no quorum present. Before the Chair determined whether there was a quorum present, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] moved that the House adjourn. He withheld that motion for the purpose of considering matters by unanimous consent. The previous question, however, had been ordered upon the bill; and in the view of the Chair the vote on the bill should come the first thing to-morrow morning after the approval of the Journal and the disposition of such other privileged matters as might take precedence.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, let the bill be reported first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the construction by the city of Huntington, Ind., of a dam for water-supply purposes across Wabash River, at such location and in accordance with such plans as may be approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War: Provided, That no dam constructed under this authorization shall be used to develop water power nor to generate electricity: Provided further, That this act shall be null and void unless the dam hereby authorized is commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KRAUS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 23, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. DYER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1060) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce," approved October 29, 1919, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 212), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RHODES, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3721) to authorize and provide for the acquisition of title to lands to be used as a Government fuel yard, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 213), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5824) to vacate and close certain streets and alleys within the area known as the Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 214), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. McARTHUR, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7263) to establish rates of pay for enlisted men of the insular force of the Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 215), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, the bill (H. R. 7300) authorizing the Postmaster General to appoint delegates to the Pan American Postal Congress, was reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WALSH: A bill (H. R. 7323) to provide for the appointment of two additional judges of the District Court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. VAILE: A bill (H. R. 7324) granting pensionable status to surviving members of the Third Battalion of Ohio Militia who served during the Civil War and to widows of certain members of said battalion; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota: A bill (H. R. 7325) to provide for payment to any officer, enlisted man, female nurse, or civilian employee of the American Expeditionary Forces of loss sustained on a negotiable instrument by reason of a fluctuation in the rate of exchange, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHELTON: A bill (H. R. 7326) to provide for the erection of a post-office building at Lebanon, Mo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. HAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 7327) granting pensions to certain Indian soldiers; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 7328) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend d'Oreille River, Bonner County, Idaho, at the Newport Priest River road crossing, Idaho; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. KAHN: Resolution (H. Res. 125) for the consideration of House bills 7111 and 7158, House joint resolution 138, and Senate bill 1358; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ATKESON: A bill (H. R. 7329) granting a pension to Bertha Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DARROW: A bill (H. R. 7330) for the relief of Anna Carroll; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7331) for the relief of G. L. Aldendifer; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GREENE of Vermont: A bill (H. R. 7332) granting a pension to Celia Cary; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAYDEN: A bill (H. R. 7333) for the relief of J. M. Russell; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KINDRED: A bill (H. R. 7334) for the relief of Nellie Hoar; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MOORE of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 7335) granting a pension to Amos C. Tewell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PETERSEN: A bill (H. R. 7336) for the relief of Frances E. Martin; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. RANSLEY: A bill (H. R. 7337) to correct the military record of Christopher P. Rhodes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TYSON: A bill (H. R. 7338) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to reimburse Capt. George G. Seibels, United States Navy, the sum of $170, money stolen belonging to the United States from the said Capt. George G. Seibels while in the discharge of his duties and paid into the Treasury of the United States by him; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ZIHLMAN: A bill (H. R. 7339) granting a pension to John E. Root; to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

1511. By Mr. DRIVER: Petition of Lake View Local Union, No. 659, of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, in support of the Capper bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

1512. By Mr. FULLER: Petition of W. A. Medaris, manager of the Thrift Press, Rockford, Ill., favoring reduced rates on railroads for commercial travelers; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1513. Also, petition of Local Union No. 1087, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, of Marseilles, Ill., opposing the Scott bill (H. R. 3716); to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

1514. By Mr. KINDRED: Petition of Association of Importers and Distributors of Chinese and Japanese Floor Coverings, of New York, in regard to the tariff; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1515. Also, petition of American Chemical Society, opposing the Volstead "antibeer" bill; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1516. Also, petition of Merchants' Association of New York, indorsing House bill 6420; also petition of Organization of Americans of Ukrainian Ancestry, relative to East Galicia; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1517. By Mr. KISSEL: Petition of 108 New York City residents, urging the passage of House joint resolution 18; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1518. Also, petition of 90 residents of the third New York congressional district, urging the recognition of the Irish republic; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1519. Also, petition of John Kelly, of Brooklyn, N. Y., urging the recognition of the Irish republic; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1520. By Mr. TINKHAM: Petition of Elizabeth O'Hara and 29 others of the eleventh congressional district of Massachusetts, urging recognition of the Irish republic; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1521. Also, resolutions adopted at parish meeting of St. John's Church, Roxbury, Mass., urging an international conference to discuss disarmament; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1522. By Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH: Petition of congregation of Shrewsbury Church, Kennedyville, Kent County, Md., praying for protection to be given the Armenian people; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1523. By Mr. RADCLIFFE: Petition of citizens of Paterson, N. J., relative to the recognition of the Irish republic; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1524. By Mr. SANDERS of New York: Petition of the members and congregation of the Christian Church of Lakeville, N. Y., urging the reduction of armaments; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

1525. Also, petition of the churches of Castile, N. Y., in a union meeting urging the calling of a conference of all leading nations of the world to confer on the subject of disarmaments; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 23, 1921.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, June 21, 1921.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

AVIATION AND ORDNANCE EXPERIMENTS BY ARMY AND NAVY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, D. C., June 21, 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: There was considerable trouble in the obtaining of the names of Senators who desired to witness the various gunfire tests off the Virginia capes June 21 and 22, 1921. The Navy Department sent several invitations to the Senate, and on various occasions sent a representative of the department to the Senate Office Building to solicit the names of Senators who desired to witness the first exercises. It is noted that no Senators expressed a desire to witness the first exercise, and it is thought that this is perhaps due to the fact that not all of the Senators were cognizant of this invitation and the various other details of the trip. It is therefore respectfully requested that you bring to the attention of all the Senators that the U. S. S. Henderson will sail from the navy yard, Washington, at daylight June 27 for the scene of exercise No. 2, returning to Washington some time in the afternoon of June 29. This second exercise is the one in which the planes search for and bomb the ex-battleship Iowa. Owing to the limited accommodations aboard the U. S. S. Henderson, it is impracticable to invite more than 10 Senators to occupy staterooms. There is, however, almost unlimited capacity in the standee bunks, and should more than the allotted 10 Senators apply they should be informed in advance that any in excess of 10 will be assigned standee bunks along with the officers of the Army and Navy.

It is especially requested that the list of Senators be submitted to the department not later than noon Friday, June 24, to room 3409, New Navy Building.

Sincerely, yours, EDWIN DENBY.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Capper	Heflin	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Ransdell	Watson, Ga.
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Sheppard	Watson, Ind.
Dial	Kendrick	Simmons	Williams
Dillingham	La Follette	Smith	Willis
Fletcher	McNary	Smoot	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	Moses	Sterling
Glass	Nelson	Trammell
Harris	Nicholson	Wadsworth

Mr. MOSES. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. KEYES] on official business. I ask that the announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING], who are in attendance at a hearing before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], who are holding a hearing before the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

Mr. CAPPER. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is absent in attendance at a hearing before the Joint Agricultural Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-three Senators having answered to their names, there is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. PENROSE, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. WALSH of Montana answered to their names when called.

Mr. FERNALD and Mr. HALE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. KING, Mr. ELKINS, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. SHORTRIDGE, Mr. BURSUM, Mr. WARREN, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. GERRY, Mr. ERNST, Mr. CAMERON, Mr. GOODING, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. KNOX, Mr. NEW, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. BROUSSARD, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. HARRELD, and Mr. BALL entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. A number of Senators have routine business to present, and I yield for that purpose.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of the American Home Economics Association, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the protection of maternity and infancy, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I present a memorandum from the Ukrainian League of South Philadelphia, Pa., in relation to the case of East Galicia, favoring the recognition by the United States of East Galicia (along with northern Bukovina) as an independent State—the West Ukrainian Republic, and so forth, which I ask be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorandum will be so referred.

Mr. CAPPER presented two petitions of sundry citizens of Kansas City, Kans., praying for the recognition of the republic of Ireland by the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2422) for the relief of settlers and entrymen on Baca Float No. 3, in the State of Arizona, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 146) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 2421) granting certain public lands to the city of Phoenix, Ariz., for municipal purposes (Rept. No. 147); and

A bill (H. R. 5622) providing for the appraisal and sale of the Vashon Island Military Reservation in the State of Washington, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 148).

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 985) to amend the provisions of an act relating to certain railway corporations owning or operating street railways in the District of Columbia, approved June 5, 1900, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 149) thereon.

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1032) for the relief of Maj. Francis M. Maddox, United States Army, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 150) thereon.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 496) for the relief of George A. Robertson, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report (No. 151) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 1434) for the relief of the Fidelity & Deposit Co., of Maryland, Baltimore, Md., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 152) thereon.

Mr. FERNALD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 1905) providing for the relief of certain contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 153) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 112) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to employees of the United States Department of Agriculture who died in the war with Germany, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1312) to amend the charter of the Potomac Insurance Co. of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 154) thereon.

Mr. CALDER, from the Committee on Commerce, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 6652) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River, in Muskogee County, Okla. (Rept. No. 155); and

A bill (H. R. 6653) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at a point near Webbers Falls, in Muskogee County, Okla. (Rept. No. 156).

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1063) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Charlotte W. Miller, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 157) thereon.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1771) to authorize the United States, through the United States Shipping Board, to acquire a site on Hazzell Island, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, for a fuel and fuel-oil station and fresh-water reservoir for Shipping Board and other merchant vessels, as well as United States naval vessels, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 158) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2069) to authorize the construction of a dam across the Wabash River, at Huntington, Ind. (Rept. No. 159);

A bill (H. R. 4976) granting the consent of Congress to the Trumbull Steel Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Mahoning River, in the State of Ohio (Rept. No. 160); and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 63) granting consent of Congress to the States of New York and New Jersey to enter into the agreement for the establishment of "the port of New York authority" (Rept. No. 161).

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2133) ceding jurisdiction to the State of Texas over certain lands or bancos acquired by the United States of America from the United States of Mexico; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2134) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 2136) granting a pension to Agnes Gibbons; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 2137) providing that the act approved December 17, 1919, entitled "An act to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relatives of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct," shall be executed and administered as though it had been passed and approved October 6, 1917; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TRAMMELL:

A bill (S. 2138) providing that the Government property, known as the St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHORTRIDGE:

A bill (S. 2139) granting an increase of pension to Giles Otis Pearce; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 2140) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple to the University of Arizona, State of Arizona, of Tucson, Ariz., for a certain described tract of land; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2141) for the relief of Charles W. Mock; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2142) granting a pension to Elizabeth Gates Perry; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURSUM:

A bill (S. 2143) to establish one or more fish-cultural stations in the State of New Mexico; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 2144) for the relief of Melquiades Sanchez; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REFUNDING OF FOREIGN LOANS.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have referred to the Committee on Finance a very important measure, which is entitled a bill to enable the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

The bill (S. 2135) to enable the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania, if the bill which he has just introduced providing for the refunding of foreign loans is a short bill, it ought to be printed in the RECORD, as I think the subject is of very great interest.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts a very excellent one, and I ask that the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized from time to time to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation), arising out of the European war, into bonds or other obligations of such, or of any other, foreign Government, and from time to time to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign Government in substitution for those now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all claims not now represented by bonds or obligations which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire also at this time to state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the purpose on the part of the Committee on Finance is immediately to hold hearings for the Treasury officials.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SMOOT. On the calendar day of June 22 the bill (H. R. 1475) providing for a grant of land to the State of Washington for a biological station and general research purposes was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. I ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as it is for a military reservation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent for the discharge of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads from the consideration of Senate joint resolution 80 and that that measure be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That committee has once considered it, and I think that is the proper place for the joint resolution to go.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, what bill is that?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It is a joint resolution proposing to appropriate $5,000 to send delegates to the Pan American Postal Convention at Buenos Aires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 80 be taken from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENTS TO SEASONAL COAL RATE BILL.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted six amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act as amended to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. KING submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act as amended to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. STANLEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

SHIPPING IN THE SOUTHEAST.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I present and desire to have printed in the RECORD a short article from the Charleston News and Courier in regard to shipping in the Southeast.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"FARM MACHINERY TO PASS THROUGH PORT—TRAINLOAD ON WAY HERE—GOODS CONSIST OF TRACTORS AND FARM IMPLEMENTS FOR THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

"What is probably the first special train to be operated from any western railway and with freight consigned out of this port for a foreign destination is now rolling over the Southern Railway and South freight consigned to the Carolina Co.

"The train which left Chicago Thursday night consists of 42 cars of machinery, tractors, and farm implements manufactured in the States of Wisconsin, Illinois, and Indiana, and is destined to Buenos Aires, Argentine Republic.

"The route of the train is by way of the Chicago, Indianapolis & Louisville Railroad, known as the Monon Route, to Louisville and the Southern Railway to this city. It is expected to reach here Wednesday, and the work of unloading the machinery will be commenced at once.

"The Shipping Board steamer St. Johns County will arrive in port to-morrow or Tuesday, to transport the supplies to the South American port.

"The securing of this business for the port of Charleston is the result of an extensive program of solicitation which the officials of the Carolina Co. have been engaged in for some time. Mr. J. A. Von Dohlen, traffic manager of the shipping company, made a trip to Chicago several weeks ago, and conferred with the traffic managers of some of the largest exporting firms in that city and surrounding country, apprising them of the schedule of sailings of ships of the Carolina Co. These 42 cars of machinery and farm implements are only the initial step, as other shipments are expected from time to time.

"Mr. Von Dohlen states that quite a few of the traffic managers with whom he talked at the time of his trip evidenced a great deal of interest in the port of Charleston and the efforts which his company is making to build up the foreign trade of the port. Since then a great many inquiries have been received by him from some of these men, and at an early date the local concern expects to be handling a quantity of export goods which are now moving through other ports.

"Mr. Von Dohlen expects to leave to-morrow afternoon for New York City to confer with officials of one of the largest exporting concerns in the Nation's metropolis, as the latter have made inquiry as to the sailings of ships of the Carolina Co., and if the proper arrangements can be made between the two companies another important announcement will be forthcoming in the next few days, it is said."

INTERSTATE HIGHWAY SYSTEM.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, several days ago I reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads Senate bill 1355, which is known as the interstate highway bill. The bill and report are on the desk of every Senator. The Senate will remember that in the last session of Congress I stated, with what was apparently the approval of all Senators, that I should endeavor to get enacted into law early in the coming session a bill providing for the continuation of Federal aid for the construction of roads. It is very important that such action should be taken. I can not well overmagnify the importance of this fact.

I desire now to give notice that at the very earliest opportunity I shall call up for the consideration of the Senate the bill which the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has reported on this subject. I trust that every Senator understands the importance of the passage of the measure now. Unless we can get action soon, we are going very greatly to interfere with the various Federal road projects which are now under way and which may be taken up and ought to be taken up in the very early future. I repeat, that I give notice now that at the very earliest opportunity, at the conclusion of the consideration of the pending bill, if possible, I shall ask for the consideration by the Senate of the interstate highway bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement, occupying about a minute, in reference to the road bill. In view of the statement made by the Senator from Michigan in reference to the interstate road bill, known as the Townsend road bill, reported by a majority of the committee, I think it is but fair to say that there is very great difference of opinion in the committee as to the proposed legislation. The minority have filed their views in opposition to the report of the majority of the committee, and they will insist at the proper time that, instead of the Townsend bill being passed, which the minority thinks in substance and effect an automobile road bill, the present road law be amended. By the time the matter comes up for consideration I trust that all Senators will have read not only the minority report but that they will have examined the bill which has been reported by a committee of the House known as the Dowell bill, and which I have had printed and will offer as a substitute for the Townsend bill. This Dowell measure has the approval of the highway associations of every State in the Union, has been favorably reported by the Committee on Roads of the House, and no witness examined by our committee was opposed to it. Substantially every witness who was examined before the Senate committee approved that bill.

I merely make this statement in view of the statement made by the Senator from Michigan. Whenever the question comes up on the floor there is going to be a very sharp controversy in reference to a change in Federal aid to the road system which we have already adopted.

It is really a fight between the automobile associations on the one side and the farmers and other general users of roads on the other. There is no general demand, except from the automobile associations, for a repeal of the present law and the substitution of the Townsend bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator if the amendment recommended by the minority conforms in substance to the Dowell bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. The recommendations by the minority conform in substance to the Dowell bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that really the controversy is between the so-called Townsend bill on the one hand and the Dowell bill on the other.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the controversy. The amendments which are suggested by the Dowell bill, I think, everyone agrees should become the law. I think there is no opposition to these amendments to the original road law on the part of anybody. The passage of the Townsend bill would be a great blow to the cause of good roads in this country. The House committee having favorably reported the Dowell bill, it seems to me we ought not take any action on the Townsend bill until the House acts on the Dowell bill. If that bill is passed by the House, then it might well be supposed that the Senate will accept it.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, yesterday I had occasion to address the Senate on the general intent of the proposed legislation affecting the coal industry, reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I showed that the committee had approached its task animated by no spirit of passion or malevolence, and with no desire for sensation or notoriety. I said that we regarded the deplorable conditions of last year as a lesson in the need for constructive action, not as an offense for which the coal industry should be for all time pilloried. I showed how the public—ignorant of even the elemental facts about the supply and requirements of coal—offered a fertile soil in which to sow the seeds of panic and misunderstanding. I showed how the bituminous-coal industry—divided among itself, and recognizing no common leadership—is incapable of uniting behind any constructive policy. I showed how the responsible element in the coal trade, which prefers to do business conservatively, can not answer for the irresponsible element; that when, in 1920, the test came, the efforts of the conservatives availed nothing to keep the profiteers within bounds. The situation, I pointed out, is one that calls for leadership. The consumers of coal need a leader to whom they may turn for information and counsel. The forward-looking men among the producers and distributors need a leader about whom they may gather in working for the progress of their industry.

It is my thought, Mr. President, that both of these ends can be accomplished by naming some one officer to represent the United States Government on coal. I believe that by harmonious cooperation between Government, public, and industry the business of mining and marketing coal can be brought to give satisfactory service to our people. I believe this can be attained without the slightest sacrifice of that traditional freedom of action of the American business man, which freedom of action I hold as dear as any man in this Chamber. I know that there are many individuals in the coal trade who agree with this view, who are willing to meet the Government half way. I honor them. But to those who are bent on opposing all legislation, in whatever spirit drafted, I utter this solemn warning: "Gentlemen, if you do not convince the public now that you recognize your stewardship in the development of the great natural resource which the people of the United States have intrusted to you, the mutterings of discontent will grow into an irresistible demand for drastic regulation which will sweep everything before it."

Both of the coal bills offered by the Committee on Interstate Commerce are constructive in character, and neither may be described as regulation. I ask your attention this morning to Senate bill 1806, providing for seasonal freight rates.

SEASONAL COAL FREIGHT RATES.

The bill aims to overcome the present seasonal irregularity in the production and transportation of coal by encouraging the purchase of coal in spring and summer for storage against fall and winter. Specifically, the bill clothes the Interstate Commerce Commission with authority to initiate or to readjust seasonal coal rates. The bill has the general approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The commission doubts its authority to promulgate seasonal rates without a specific grant of power from Congress to that end. The bill leaves the widest discretion to the commission in the application of the principle of seasonal rates. The rates may be promulgated to affect the carriers as a whole or to affect differently individual coal fields or rate groups. The commission is, however, instructed so to adjust the seasonal differentials that the carriers will receive the same annual revenue as if no seasonal variations were provided. The commission is further empowered by the bill, in the event of an emergency affecting the transportation of coal, to suspend existing rates without a formal hearing and to initiate seasonal rates in lieu thereof.

In advocating the passage of this bill I shall endeavor to show (1) the nature and extent of the seasonal variation in coal production; (2) that seasonal coal rates are the only practical means to overcome the seasonal irregularity in production and transportation; (3) that the promulgation of seasonal coal rates is needed (a) to assist the coal-mining industry, (b) to relieve the transportation system of the country, and (c) to protect the public against shortages of coal by encouraging storage. Finally, it is my purpose to show that (4) immediate action is necessary on this bill, because the production of coal during the present season has been dangerously delayed. Something must be done at once to stimulate the movement from mine to consumer in order to build up a reserve above ground adequate for future needs.

The argument for seasonal coal rates lies not in theories but in certain mathematical facts. Those facts speak for themselves. To present them in the simplest manner I have reduced them to the charts which hang on the wall. The same charts and some others are reproduced in miniature in the blue-covered booklet which has been distributed. Senators so placed that they can not see the wall charts may follow the argument from the booklet.

THE PROBLEM OF SEASONAL VARIATION IN COAL PRODUCTION.

What are these variations in output which seasonal rates are designed to overcome?

Of all the facts about coal which have forced themselves upon our attention in the past six years, none is more striking than the extraordinary irregularity of the operation of the bituminous-coal industry. We have learned that while the anthracite mines and the anthracite-carrying roads operate fairly steadily, the bituminous mines are idle a large part of the time. We have learned that the production of bituminous coal and in consequence the load upon the railroads fluctuate violently. We find that there are three types of fluctuation at work. In the first place, there are great variations in annual production from one year to the next. Let me illustrate by pointing to the last of the wall charts [wall chart No. 8]. This chart, by the way, is reproduced on page 16 of the blue booklet. Through the center of that chart zigzags a heavy black line. That represents the production of soft coal in each year from 1890 to 1920. Suppose we pick up the line at the year 1913. In that year, with business active, we produced 478,000,000 tons of bituminous coal. The next year, 1914, production fell back to 423,000,000 tons, a drop of 55,000,000 tons. Thereafter it rose sharply, reaching in 1918 the maximum of 579,000,000 tons. The year afterwards it fell off more than a hundred million tons, the total for 1919 being only 458,000,000 tons. In 1920 it rose again to 556,000,000 tons. This year it is plunging in the other direction. In the first five months of 1921 we have been producing at the rate of only 320,000,000 tons a year.

Now, I do not pretend that these annual changes in output would be overcome by seasonal freight rates. Some of these tremendous peaks and valleys mean an unstabilized market, with coal piling up in storage one year, and flowing dangerously out of storage the next year. Concerning that phase of the problem I shall have more to say in discussing Senate bill 1807, entitled "An act to be known as the coal industry stabilization act." Clearly, however, these annual fluctuations are primarily due to changes in the general tone of business, reflected in the quantity of coal consumed. Such annual changes are beyond the influence of seasonal coal rates to modify. They deserve no further attention at this point.

So much for the annual fluctuations. Look now, if you please, at a second type of irregular operation seen in the next to the last of the wall charts [wall chart No. 7]. This chart illustrates daily fluctuations in output. The first of the orange columns represents the output on Monday, the second on Tuesday, and so on. The diagram shows that in a typical week car supply is favorable on Monday, and grows less and less satisfactory as the week progresses. Concerning this type of fluctuation, too, I shall have more to say in the discussion of Senate bill 1807, which directs the Secretary of Commerce to cooperate with the Interstate Commerce Commission in promoting the proper distribution of coal cars. I do not pretend, however, that these daily irregularities, any more than the annual irregularities, can be overcome by seasonal rates on coal.

The third type of fluctuations in coal output is the one with which this bill is concerned. It can be seen clearly in the largest of the wall charts [wall chart No. 1]. The same curve will be found in diagram 1 of the booklet of charts. In that chart the heavy black line shows for each month the daily rate of soft coal production. It begins with 1913 and runs to May, 1921. Before going to that chart, however, I wish to point out certain features on the chart nearest the clock.

From 1913 to 1919 you will observe that the capacity of the mines in this country, indicated by the green line, increased by about 150,000,000 tons, until to-day the present capacity with the men employed is nearly 800,000,000 tons, provided they were employed a full number of days during the year. The number of men had increased from 200,000 in 1890 to nearly 620,000 in 1919, while the production had increased from 115,000,000 tons in 1890 to nearly 550,000,000 tons in 1920. It also shows that the price at the mine increased from practically $1.15 up to $3.50 in 1920. Those are average prices, not spot prices. They refer to contract coal at the mine, including all sales.

There is one especially significant feature of that chart, and that is the loss of working days in a year. In 1913 it was 76; in 1919 it was 111. It runs almost to an average of 90. I shall later compare that with the working days in the Austrian and English mines, which run much higher than in the mines in the United States, our average being 232 working days, while in the Austrian mines the average is over 300. The mines in the United States lose in economic value by the number of working days lost, caused by seasonal fluctuations, overproduction, overdevelopment, and also strikes. It would seem that something should be done to equalize that value in order that we may gain more efficiency and more production of evening the distribution of coal, thereby keeping the miners at more steady work and employment.

To return to chart 1, suppose we look at the left, where the black line starts. That starting point is the rate in January, 1913. Now let your eye follow the curve in its downward plunge to the low point, or trough, in April. Then see how it turns and rises steeply to a peak in November, falling off again slightly in December. That April low and November high is a typical year's story in bituminous coal mining, and also, by the way, a typical year's story in bituminous coal transportation. This seasonal history of coal production and transportation is repeated year after year. It occurred, you will note, in 1914, in 1915, and in 1916. The very exceptions during the war period are exceptions that prove the rule. The demand during the war years was so extraordinary that consumers had to take their coal in summer or go without, for the overtaxed railroads could not carry it all in the usual seasonal troughs and peaks.

The year 1918 is particularly interesting, because it shows that when all are bent on increasing output it is actually possible to produce more in summer than in winter. Nineteen hundred and eighteen stands for a stabilized year as far as output is concerned. But after the war, even during the troublous conditions of the reconstruction period, the seasonal movement returned to fasten itself upon the soft-coal industry. Note the profound slump in the early part of 1919, and note also the artificial drop created by the strike of November, 1919. Note that the course of production in 1920 also showed this seasonal aspect, and finally note that in the present year the April slump carried production down to the lowest point, except for the two strikes, touched in the whole eight-year period.

To center attention on the seasonal variation as it affects transportation especially I have had the third chart prepared. [Wall chart No. 3, typical transportation demand of the soft-coal industry.] This likewise appears as No. 7 in the booklet. The chart shows what the mines are likely to be called on to produce and the railroads called upon to transport in a typical year. It assumes that the total annual requirement is 528,000,000 tons, an average of 44,000,000 tons a month. The chart is divided into two parts. At the right is a table in which the figures of output are given, expressed in millions of tons. At the left is the same thing in the form of a diagram. The black columns in the diagram represent the tons of coal to be produced and transported in each month of such a typical year, January, February, and so on, indicated underneath the black lines. As indicated by the experience of the past eight years, American consumers would call for about 48,000,000 tons during the month of January, and progressively less to April. In April they would take about 36,000,000 tons, and thereafter more each month up to a maximum in November of 48,000,000 tons. Now, what the seasonal rate bill proposes in effect is that freight rates be so adjusted as to flatten out these black columns to even lengths. What I want to do is to cut off the tops of these columns above the average line and fill in the low months from March to August. That means putting the excess into storage. You will note that the quantity to be stored—that is, the surplus above the average—amounts to about 21,000,000 tons in an ordinary year.

In other words, the January production is 4,000,000 tons above the average. The February production is 2,000,000 tons above, while March, April, May, June, and July are low points of production, the output amounting to 21,000,000 tons. We want to take the 21,000,000 tons off of the autumn and winter months, or the high point of production, and equalize it by increasing the production in the summer months. That is the object of giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to adjust these seasonal freight rates—to induce the public to buy their coal in the summer season.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that the purpose of the Senator, as he has said, is to even off the black lines shown on the chart, and he proposes to do that by giving the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to grant a lower rate for the transportation of coal in the summer time, so as to increase the production and the storage of coal in that period. Would not that have this effect, then, that those who can store coal, the large consumers—the railroads, for example, and other large industries which have facilities for storing coal—would get the benefit of the lower rates and the larger production, if the Senator's idea is carried out; but the small consumer, who can not store coal, would have the disadvantage of the relatively higher rates in the wintertime? Would it not have that effect?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not to any great extent; because the storing of coal would practically be done by the wholesale or retail dealer, and while the increased freight rate would in some measure affect the price, the inducement to buy coal in the summer time would be so great to the man who bought coal in bulk that it would simply mean that the coal was stored by the wholesaler or retailer for distribution to the consumer. It would to some extent increase the price.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator knows, of course, that it is not practicable to store coal without running the risk of great deterioration, unless it is stored under water. There is nobody except the railroads and other very large consumers in a position to afford such storage. So it seems to me that if the bill works out as the Senator plans it will work out, if it has any effect at all, the only effect will be to give the larger consumer the benefit of the decreased freight rate, but the householder who wants to buy his coal in the wintertime will have the relative disadvantage of the higher freight rate. So the very purpose the Senator has in mind would be defeated.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I had anticipated that the question of storage would come up. A great deal of misconception has arisen regarding the storage of soft coal. There is very little of the soft coal produced that can not be stored. The answer to the question as to the storage of coal is that during the war we stored 63,000,000 tons, while to-day we have stored probably from thirty to thirty-five million tons. In some sections there is a certain quality of coal that is not stored, but very little. Coal can be stored, and is stored, under modern methods, and the complete answer to the Senator's question is that, by reason of necessity, 15,000,000 tons of anthracite and bituminous, largely bituminous, are stored at the head of the Great Lakes every summer, and in addition to that there are other storage piles all over the country, when people are laying in their coal, at the public utilities stations, in the wholesale coal yards, as well as in the Government yards here in Washington, where the officials, who stored soft coal during the entire period of the war, have made a study of the subject. Modern methods have been applied to prevent deterioration and to take care of the fire risk. But I admit, sir, that a still further study should be carried on by the Government in order to prevent any further loss, and that is one of the objects of the other bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator did not understand my question, except in part, because his answer is not quite responsive to the question.

I understand his purpose to be the relief of the home owner, the comparatively small user of coal. My contention is, as I understand the bill, that if seasonal rates are applied, as is proposed under this measure, giving the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to make a different rate in the summer time from that which obtains in the wintertime, then, instead of relieving the householder, the small consumer of coal, the fellow who is going to get the advantage will be the large consumer of coal, who has facilities for storing it, but it will not afford relief to the householder. On the contrary, he will have the disadvantage of the relatively higher rate. What does the Senator say to that?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. A seasonal rate on coal is not a new thing, as far as the West is concerned. I know we have had it in Utah for at least 15 years. I do not know whether it was put into effect this past year or not, but I do know that we have had it for at least 15 years; and I will say to the Senator from Ohio that, as far as the bituminous coal in Utah is concerned, the seasonal rate has been put into effect for the months of July and August, which are the months when coal is stored. The rate is 25 cents a ton less during the months of July and August, and the coal operators themselves give 25 cents a ton to the men who purchase and store it. But, as far as our coal is concerned, the man who purchases the coal at 50 cents less in July or August does not make anything extra upon the purchase of the storage coal, even at the 50-cent reduction, on account of the extra cost and deterioration. In fact, it costs 25 cents a ton less to take coal direct from a car and deliver it immediately to the purchaser than to unload into a bin or stacking it in a pile. This is at least 25 cents loss. Again, the interest upon the money used by the man who stores the coal must be paid, and is an extra loss, and the shrinkage is at least 5 per cent.

But the advantage of it, and the only reason bituminous coal is stored in Utah, is that when the winter months come it is impossible to get the coal; the railroads can not carry it because of lack of cars, and the miners can not produce it to meet the demand; but the man who buys the coal during the seasonal months has the coal on hand to deliver, and therefore the people of the State can purchase that coal and have it delivered to them in case it is stored; but it would be a physical impossibility to deliver unless it was stored.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, what does the Senator from Utah say in response to the inquiry I propounded to the Senator from New Jersey? Is it not a fact, then, that the people who have the facilities for storing this coal, and who do store it—very largely the railroads and other large consumers—are the ones who get the advantage of that seasonal rate, but the householder, who buys his coal in the wintertime in small quantities, under these seasonal rates has the disadvantage of the relatively higher rates?

Mr. SMOOT. As far as the wholesaler of coal is concerned, if there is not at least 50 cents a ton difference between the price when the coal is sold immediately from the car to the consumer and when it is stored it would never pay the wholesaler to store it. He simply does it because he will have the coal on hand when the great demand for coal takes place. When shortages occur some dealers take advantage of them and charge more for the coal; but there is no necessity for that, and it is seldom resorted to. If there was a dollar or a dollar and a half a ton difference, there would be no question of the correctness of the position of the Senator from Ohio; but as long as there is not more than 50 cents difference, the interest upon the money, the waste in unloading and reloading, and the deterioration of the coal are sufficient to absorb the 50 cents.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not believe there is any doubt about the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission now. We have had seasonal coal rates. But the commission seems to think there is some doubt about it. We do have seasonal coal rates, but I assume the commission will not grant seasonal rates that will more than make up the expense of storing the coal and getting it during those months.

To-day, or the last time I looked at the quotations within a short time, cash coal in Illinois and Indiana was selling from 50 cents to $1 a ton cheaper than coal for delivery later in the season. Even that did not cause the mines to be run to capacity. We have a seasonal rate now to the Great Lakes which the commission found absolutely necessary in order to move the coal which must be moved in the summer time, as they can not move it in the wintertime by the Lakes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. What is the differential?

Mr. KELLOGG. It is 28 cents a ton. The differential expires, I think, in September of this year.

Mr. NEW. That rate applies only to certain Lake ports.

Mr. KELLOGG. That rate applies to Lake ports taking coal, where it must be hauled exclusively by water and in the summer time, of course.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the Senator give it as his opinion as a lawyer, and I value that opinion very highly, that the Interstate Commerce Commission now has the power sought to be granted in the pending bill?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think they have. The commission do not think so, and that is the reason why we reported the bill. I have a good deal of doubt whether it will accomplish all that it is intended to accomplish, but if there is any way of encouraging the production of coal in the months when it is confessedly very low, so that men may have employment all the time and the railroads may be occupied to their capacity, we ought to try it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I wish to answer the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] who has propounded two questions. The first question was, will not this work an unnecessary hardship on domestic users of coal in the wintertime? That is a very practical question. Coal is used in a domestic capacity to the extent of less than 100,000,000 tons a year, and the other 400,000,000 tons are used by the railroads and by the public utilities and industries and are reflected in the cost of everything that the people use. But when it comes to a question of domestic coal, or the small consumer, it is a very practical question.

But let me point out, sir, that by reason of the shortage created by this unequal supply and distribution, the prices in the wintertime mount high and advantage is taken of them by the retailer and the wholesaler by reason of the scarcity caused by the nonstorage of coal and caused by the shortage of transportation facilities.

Transportation facilities in the autumn and winter are overburdened with crops, with building materials, and with coal. To-day there are 150,000 idle coal cars at a time when the railroads can carry coal much more cheaply than in the wintertime. If that coal can be transported to the bins of the retailer or the domestic consumer, it means that he buys the coal at a time when it can be sold at its lowest cost, when it is sold at its lowest cost, transported at its lowest cost, when he can get the advantage of the seasonal freight rates, and when he will be free from the competition caused by the shortage in the wintertime.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have before me a chart prepared at the request of the Senator from New Jersey——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What is the number of it, may I ask?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The one at which I am looking just now is No. 15, which relates to the anthracite production. Anthracite, of course, is used almost entirely in domestic consumption, as I understand. From this chart it appears that there is not much seasonal variation in the production of anthracite; that is, the coal used for domestic consumption. I notice in the heading of that chart this statement:

> Anthracite production is practically stationary at 90,000,000 net tons per year, except when as in 1917 and 1918 unusual prices for steam coal encouraged more extensive reworking of the culm banks. There is only a slight seasonal decline in output, the number of working days lost is small, and so far as production and transportation are concerned the anthracite industry is stable.

Now, that relates almost entirely to coal for domestic consumption. Of the bituminous coal a very small percentage, relatively, is used in domestic consumption. My recollection is that only about 10 or 12 per cent of the bituminous output finds its way into the home and is used for domestic purposes.

I should like to know to what extent the Senator feels that making a difference in the transportation rates would affect the home consumption of bituminous coal and to what extent it would stabilize that industry? The stabilization of the anthracite industry, I think, has been brought about to some extent by the mine owners making a discrimination in the price of coal with respect to seasons. In my section of the country the mine owners do the same thing with reference to bituminous coal. I can not see that the domestic consumer is going to be benefited very much by the passage of the bill. I think, as stated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], that only those can be benefited who have an opportunity to make storage of large quantities of coal.

If I recollect correctly, about one-third, roughly speaking, of the bituminous coal is consumed by the railroads themselves. A reduction of freight rates would not materially affect them, taken as a whole, and at any rate the difference in cost of transportation would not be, in my opinion, an inducement to the railroads themselves to store their own coal. If they desire to store, they will do it for some other reason. In the industrial line, so far as my information goes, there is very little preparation for storage. That is a feature which needs to be worked out and encouraged.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And studied.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes. I agree that there should be some plan worked out which would induce the large industrial concerns to store coal and equalize the seasonal demand, but I can not see how, under present conditions, the passage of the bill is going to help materially the domestic consumers of the country.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In reply to the Senator from New Mexico, I think it will greatly assist in the lowering of the cost of anthracite to the domestic consumers. I think that a differential of 25 or 30 cents a ton will induce storage by a great many people who have storage facilities, and everyone in my section of the country is more or less provided with storage facilities for their winter needs and domestic supplies. I think an allowance of 25 cents a ton when the transportation is available will induce the domestic consumers to buy a great deal of anthracite.

While it is true that the distribution of anthracite is more or less stable, or more so than bituminous, it is not entirely so. We produce and use about 90,000,000 net tons of anthracite. About 30 per cent of that is used in industry for steam coal. The other 70 per cent is used by domestic consumers, mostly along the Atlantic coast and the northern seaboard.

But the big question here is one of the uneconomic situation in relation to the railroads and the effect of the heavy burden caused by bituminous tonnage which they are called upon to carry in the wintertime. That is what I seek to relieve. If the industries of the country, which use probably 250,000,000 tons, will take 21,000,000 off of the peak load, it will relieve transportation to a tremendous extent. It will help the railroads, because, looking at chart No. 5, it will be seen that the railroad profits or returns have practically followed the seasonal distribution of coal. It has a marked effect on the railroad situation.

The one big problem that we have to face is that the panic prices, $25 or $30 coal, have been caused by a shortage of transportation because the railroads were called upon to carry it when they were pressed for cars from every direction. What I wish is to have the Interstate Commerce Commission offer an inducement to those who have coal-storage facilities, the large industrial buyers, to take that surplus coal off of the winter months and put it on the summer months, and thus relieve the transportation situation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I continue just a moment longer? It was so necessary to induce the purchase of coal in the Northwest that the carriers interested in Lake transportation of coal fixed a seasonal reduction of 28 cents and called upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to approve it. I believe I am correct in that statement. It was so necessary that something be done to induce the movement of that coal that they themselves did it. There are other districts in the country where the carriers are not so progressive, where the movement of the coal could be induced in like manner, and transportation could be relieved. Therefore the bill is introduced with the idea of allowing the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix seasonal rates for that purpose.

I yield now to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am in sympathy with the purpose which the Senator from New Jersey seeks to accomplish, but thus far it seems to me that it does not appear that if the proposed change were made it would accomplish the end which the Senator seeks. It does not appear that there is any opportunity to store a great quantity of cheap coal even if the inducements were made, and why make the inducements if the consumer is not prepared to take advantage of them and if the great industries of the country are not prepared, as I am advised, to store coal in any considerable quantity? So if the rates were reduced I do not think it sufficiently appears thus far with reasonable certainty that the end would be accomplished which the Senator seeks.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In complete answer to the Senator from New Mexico I ask him to turn to chart numbered 8, which shows that during the year 1918 the stock of coal actually in the hands of consumers, which means in storage, was 63,000,000 tons, which shows that there are facilities for storing coal; that to-day the probable normal stock on hand is about 36,000,000 tons; and that there are ample storage facilities in the country to take care of the peak load which I am endeavoring to transfer to the summer time, 21,000,000 tons. If the Senator will turn to page 8 of the charts, he will see a chart prepared by the Geological Survey based upon actual investigation and analysis of figures showing that the country does store and did store in 1918, 63,000,000 tons of bituminous coal.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I inquire of the Senator whether that has not been the case without any reduction in railroad rates during that season? Do not the people now store coal so far as they are equipped for doing so?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; they are not buying coal on account of present freight rates, but the lowering of the freight rates will, in my opinion, induce them to buy.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course, the year 1918, we all admit, was an abnormal year; it was during the World War, and people were anxious to get coal and put it away wherever they could so as to be sure to have it on hand. However, have we before us any evidence of any witness who knows the facts that there is unfilled coal storage capacity in the country to-day?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will say to the Senator that I have evidence to show that the 50 cents seasonal reduction which the anthracite operators used to give the public had a great deal to do with stimulating the buying of summer coal. We have illustrations to show that the production increased immediately when the seasonal, summer discount was introduced. If the Senator will turn to chart 12 he will find some figures regarding that matter. This chart is headed:

DAYS LOST IN ANTHRACITE MINING BEFORE AND AFTER THE INTRODUCTION OF SUMMER DISCOUNTS.

In 1900 the companies in the anthracite region inaugurated the policy of announcing a summer discount on domestic coal. A gradual reduction in time lost followed. In the diagram the black bars show the average number of days lost. The zigzag line shows the loss in bituminous mining over the same period.

Senators will see that in 1900, when the summer discount was introduced, the number of days lost was 142; but the number of days lost decreased to as low as 15 in 1918, to 42 days in 1919; and, taking the period before the war, in 1912 to 77 days, in 1913 to 51 days, and in 1914 to 63 days. The figures demonstrate that the summer discount rate had a beneficial influence on the production of coal, the purchase of coal, and the storage of coal, and, what is more important, it resulted in more uniformity in the number of days of employment on the part of the miners at the mines.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it was the chart from which the Senator from New Jersey has just quoted which first attracted my attention and caused me to make the remarks which I have already made. It appears that that industry has been stabilized by the action of the mine owners themselves and without any reduction in rates of transportation with respect to the season.

In some sections of the country the bituminous operators do precisely the same thing, and there is an inducement to some extent for the storing of bituminous coal where it is used for domestic purposes; but it seems to me that the trouble is not here entirely, but that there are other causes. In the bituminous coal industry there is really no stability of prices, while in the anthracite coal industry there is stability of prices. The country at large feels that, so far as anthracite coal is concerned, it is so closely held and cooperation is so effective, that the price of anthracite coal is fixed, and whenever there is a reduction of 25 or 50 cents offered from the listed price of anthracite coal the purchaser is getting that much benefit from it, because the operators have the opportunity and have the will to raise the price when winter comes on; but in the bituminous coal industry there are no such stabilized market prices, and one does not know whether he is getting a reduction of 25 cents or 50 cents a ton or any reduction at all, because he does not know what the price will be two or three months hence. Even though the companies claim there is a reduction, there is no fixed or stabilized price in the bituminous industry, so far as I am advised, and one can not tell whether a reduction in the freight rate is going to induce the storage of bituminous coal or not, because one does not know what the price is going to be.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator, however, will admit that the freight reduction is fixed. Let me point out to him the situation. The Senator took two positions. He first spoke of the cooperation among the anthracite operators in bringing about the summer discounts by voluntary cooperation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was not boasting.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No. I am trying to answer the Senator and to meet his argument.

Now, let me point out to the Senator the fact that 75 per cent of the anthracite production is controlled by nine railroad companies, and that they can by agreement make the summer reduction. Anthracite coal is all produced within three or four counties in Pennsylvania, embracing, I think, something like 400 or 500 square miles; whereas the bituminous industry is stretched over 33 States and 500,000 square miles. There is no such cooperation and no such agreement as to summer reductions to stabilize the price of coal and to equalize its distribution. Therefore, the situation in regard to anthracite is not analogous to that of bituminous when it comes to the contention which the Senator raises, that cooperation has brought a stabilization in the anthracite industry, and cooperation therefore necessarily would follow in the bituminous industry.

We want to provide for securing cooperation through the other Senate bill; but the pending measure has to do with a reduction of the freight rate; it proposes to provide for fixing freight rates, and, therefore, it has no bearing whatsoever on the question suggested by the Senator, except that it gives the buyer a reduction in the freight charge which is to be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has nothing to do with the operators. In many districts the bituminous operators, with great wisdom, I will say to the Senator from New Mexico, have established seasonal rates. I know of one fuel company in Oklahoma, the McAlester Fuel Co., which has made seasonal rates, summer rates, and that action has stabilized and equalized production in the mines of that company. I hope under the other bill—the publicity bill—through some advisory council and cooperation, that the bituminous operators in this country can as a unit, through cooperation, bring about seasonal reductions; but that is not the point involved here. The point involved in the pending bill is to bring about, if possible, more coal production and to lighten the load on transportation; and the Interstate Commerce Commission is given the authority to induce summer buying by lowering the freight rates.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator now refers to the question of transportation. It is true that for several years past the coal situation has been seriously affected by the want of cars, but that is not the case now. There are at present 300,000 or 400,000 empty cars, so that if it were a car question alone that would solve itself. Lower rates are not going to promote the use of the cars. The other day in the course of a trip that I made to Ohio I met a former Ohio friend, who is now a coal operator in West Virginia, selling a large part of his product in Ohio. He said he could not now sell his coal at the mouth of the mine for $2 a ton. There are many other considerations that enter into this question besides the mere coal rate. It looks to me as if that would be simply a homeopathic dose, the benefits of which are not going to trickle through the fingers of the dealers to the consumers, in my judgment. I will have something to say on that subject later on, but it is not now a question of transportation by any means.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator if when he spoke of 300,000 idle cars he meant coal cars? My figures show 165,000 idle coal cars

Mr. POMERENE. I think the figures given by me included all cars, but a large part of them are coal cars. There is not any great demand for coal because the industries are all closed down. The manufacturers do not differ very much from the domestic consumer. We are all more or less improvident when it comes to laying in supplies. Men ordinarily do not buy their coal until the winter comes, and a 15 or 20 cent reduction in the rates for transporting coal, if that shall be accorded, will not provide an inducement for the buyer of bituminous coal to lay in his store during the summer.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will ask the Senator a question. We are all hoping that business will revive in the fall; possibly it will, and I think it will. We will then find that according to our normal consumption of coal we will be short 20,000,000 or 30,000,000 or, possibly, 40,000,000 tons. Naturally, practically all business will resume activity at the same time. The railroads will then be called upon to carry increased loads of traffic. That will mean that there will be a shortage of coal, because everybody will attempt to buy at the same time, possibly at panic prices. It was found necessary, in order to induce buying, for the carriers to reduce the rates for the transportation of coal by the Great Lakes. They wanted to get the coal to the Northwest, as they thought it was an economic necessity. I think it is an economic necessity to do whatever we can here to induce the public to buy coal.

If we can by seasonal rate reduction of freights in the next three or four months increase the purchase of coal by fifteen or twenty million tons, it may avoid a buyers' panic and may avoid a more serious situation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with all due respect to my distinguished friend, I think that is merely theory.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is the opinion of the Senator from Ohio that it is theory?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But the Senator will admit that a study of the conditions will show that we were short of coal last spring and summer?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; but the Senator must remember that under present conditions there is not only a reduction of production but there is likewise a reduction of consumption.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Undoubtedly that is true.

Mr. POMERENE. So that we can not determine what amount of coal will be needed next winter and next summer by the amount of coal that is needed this summer. With the industries in Ohio, perhaps, shut down to the extent of two-thirds of their capacity, I understand why there is not a demand for coal. The domestic consumers can buy now; there are the cars to ship coal, but they are not buying. The Senator from New Jersey—and I recognize his interest in this subject and the very great amount of care and study that he has given to it—points out an evil which has existed, but he has not demonstrated that the remedy he proposes is going to go to the right spot. That is the difficulty about this matter. Coal now can be bought; it is being mined in many places at the present high rate of production at a loss. Many mine operators would be willing to operate now, and to do so even if their accounts merely balanced at the end of the month, but they can not get the orders; and it is not yet demonstrated that if there is a reduction of 15 or 20 cents a ton in the freight rate during the summer that that is going to help. In my State—perhaps I ought not to interfere with the Senator's speech——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish the Senator would continue, as I want an open and free discussion of this matter.

Mr. POMERENE. With that suggestion, then——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course, I do not want the Senator to make an extended speech, for I desire to finish as soon as I can.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well; I think I will reserve what observations I have to make until after the Senator shall have concluded. I do not desire to inject a speech in the midst of his remarks.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me that I may ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Is the Senator from Ohio opposing the pending measure?

Mr. POMERENE. I am opposed to the pending bill. I indicated in the committee that I might vote for the second bill, but my faith has been somewhat shattered the more I study it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I thought I remembered that in the committee the Senator had favored the bill——

Mr. POMERENE. No; not this bill.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And I merely wondered why he had changed his mind.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not favor the pending bill.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Then it was the other one the Senator supported?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. When the seasonal-rate plan was first suggested I thought it was a very happy idea, but has proven to be a little like the bumblebee—biggest when it was born.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I hope it has not stung anybody yet.

Mr. POMERENE. No; but if it has not got a stinger later on, I am afraid it will prove a gold brick.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to get from the Senator his views upon the question as to who will get the benefit of this reduced rate, provided it is arranged for. Does the Senator believe that the consumer will get it, or that the operator will get it, or that the retail dealer will get it?

That is a question that has been troubling me a good deal. I may say to the Senator that my mind is still open as to this bill, and I should like to get information on that point if the Senator has any to furnish.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will say to the Senator that a large portion of the bituminous coal is contract, f. o. b. mine, bought by the public utilities and industries of the country; and it is my opinion that if it is bought f. o. b. mine a 25 per cent reduction in the freight rate can not be taken by the wholesaler or the retailer if the agreement is made through them. Furthermore, I believe that if the freight rate stimulates the buying of coal—as I do believe it will, notwithstanding the gloomy forecast of my friend the Senator from Ohio, who has less faith in this legislation than I have—I feel that the small consumer will directly benefit by reason of the increased supply at a time when there is apt to be scarcity. If you have a plentiful supply of cars and a plentiful supply of coal, the consumer will get it low enough.

The Senator says that I have not demonstrated the benefit of this legislation. I point out to him that it was found necessary in order to market the coal in Ohio, the State which he represents, in the lake transportation district, to lower the rates of freight on coal to get that coal above the Lakes—the lake transportation coal. They made a 28-cent reduction to stimulate the buying there. In my opinion, that demonstrates the advisability of giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix and adjust these rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I fear that some Senators are looking at this proposed legislation from a point of view which is hardly warranted. There is nothing in this bill, as I understand it, that will reduce the price of coal taking a year as the standard, because the rates that are lowered in the summer will be advanced in the winter. Our question is simply whether it is wise to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to make coal rates lower in the summer than in the winter.

Entirely apart from everything that has been said here, I think that authority ought to be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission; for it is not to be assumed that the commission will exercise that authority unless it will accomplish some wise and beneficent object. I think we ought to keep our minds clearly upon that point; and it is hardly material to debate what effect a reduction of 25 cents in the summer and an advance of 25 cents in the winter will have upon the coal movement, because that question can be very safely given to the Interstate Commerce Commission for answer.

If the Senator from New Jersey will pardon me, I should like to state what I think the real object of this legislation is, and why it is that the Interstate Commerce Commission feels that it has not the authority under the present law to establish these rates.

The chief purpose of this legislation, as I look at it, is an economic and industrial one. The chief purpose is to enable the coal industry of this country to dismiss 25 per cent of the miners who are employed not more than 230 days in a year, but who must be employed as miners and who must be maintained at or near the coal mines because at certain seasons of the year there is a demand for the entire capacity of the mines, and these men must be there to produce the coal. If we could produce the same amount of coal in each month of the year, 25 per cent of the men who are now engaged in mining could seek some other employment, and the remaining 75 per cent could be employed continuously throughout the year. That is not only economically to be desired, but from the standpoint of restlessness and discontent it is still more to be desired.

One of the great causes of disturbance at the coal mines of the country lies in the fact that a large proportion of the coal miners are necessarily idle a large proportion of the time, and it is impossible to preserve content and order among men who are idle. It is not their fault that they are idle. The fault lies in the uneven distribution of coal from month to month, the uneven demand for coal.

I do not say that a reduction in freight rates upon coal in the summer time, with a corresponding increase in the wintertime, would fully accomplish that object. I do not know, nor can any human being tell with certainty, but I do know that these reductions in freight rates in the summer time would have a tendency to accomplish the object; and inasmuch as no possible objection, as I look at it, can be found against reposing this authority in the Interstate Commerce Commission, I think we ought to do it, and I think we ought to do it unanimously.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment.

The reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission feels that it has not authority to do this thing is that it mistakenly, I think—because I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the commission has the authority now to do it—feels that it has no right, in determining the reasonableness of a rate upon coal, to consider economic conditions. For instance, the commission feels that it has no right to consider the matter of which I have just spoken—namely, that a reduction in the freight rates in the summer time would have a tendency to promote continuous, steady employment at the mines—and it therefore declines to make these rates.

I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I merely wanted to ask this question as bearing upon the extent to which this bill would meet the mischief that has been described as the mischief toward which it is directed, namely, how much will it affect the price of coal? Because you must consider this fact:

The three great consumers of coal are the great factories of the country, the railroads of the country, and the steamships, both domestic and foreign, that coal at our ports. They take their coal day by day and week by week, summer and winter. They must have their requirements met. Of course, under the seasonal rates they would get a little advantage in the summer; they would pay a higher sum in the winter. The remainder of the coal is consumed by the people. Now, what percentage of the people who must have coal to cook their food and warm their houses have the funds to lay in a stock of coal at the lower seasonal rates? The great bulk of the people must buy their coal from week to week; and the time when they need it—in the winter—will be the time when they will have to pay the highest price for it under the arrangement proposed in this bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, allow me to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Pennsylvania, although I recognize that I have no title to the floor.

I do not believe that it will make any difference in the price of coal to the class of people that the Senator from Pennsylvania calls domestic consumers. In my judgment, so far as the price made by the dealer to the consumer is concerned, 25 cents a ton or 30 cents a ton or 40 cents a ton taken from the freight rate in the summer and added to the freight rate in the winter will be of no consequence whatever. I think the domestic consumer will pay substantially the same price in either event. I do not look upon this legislation as a measure of relief to the domestic consumer against high prices for coal. I assume that if the dealer finds that he can store the coal in the summer and save money he will do it, and he will have his coal stored; but I am not convinced that he will reduce the price to the consumer on that account. I do not know. The domestic consumer, however, uses probably 10 or 12 per cent of the coal produced; I do not remember just the proportion; possibly a little more than that.

So far as the great users of coal are concerned, the railroads would not be affected materially by the reduction in the freight rate, because the railroads would only be affected by the reduction in the freight rate for that part of the carriage before the coal reaches their own rails. They charge nothing for the carriage of coal upon their own rails, and it makes no difference what the freight rate is after the coal reaches that point. But I assume that the principal inducement to the large users of coal would be, first, a reduction in the rate which might enable them to store their coal during the summer; second, in the certainty of having the coal, and that certainty they could acquire in no other way than by getting it in the summer, because they can not tell whether the exigencies of transportation in the fall and winter will permit them to get the coal as rapidly as they desire it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in coming to the conclusion that the dealers would store their coal and have it on hand when the demand arose for it, has the Senator taken into consideration the fact that the dealer, in determining what he would do, would have to keep in mind the fact that he would have his capital invested in the stored coal, that he would be at much larger expense for storage facilities, and that he would have the increased risk of the coal being wasted, both as to its quality, and perhaps through theft or otherwise? All of those things must be taken into consideration and would be taken into consideration by the dealer in making up his mind as to whether he would have a supply on hand or not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I embraced all those elements when I said that if the dealer found it profitable to store the coal he would do it. If the dealer does not find it profitable to store the coal, no harm can ensue, because he will wait, just as he does now, for the winter months.

Mr. POMERENE. And no good will come of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intended to make just a brief statement, but permit me to say that the second object of the bill, which is hardly less important than the first, is the release of the equipment of the railroads, so that that equipment can perform its full service.

I know very well that just now all kinds of business are in a state of collapse, the railroads among the business enterprises of the country, which are in that condition. We have no demand for a large part of the transportation facilities now in existence. But I assume that it is within the possibilities anyhow that there will be a revival of business in the United States and that the equipment which the railroad companies now have will be needed, as it has been so often needed before, and if we can use these cars in the summer time for the transportation of a greater quantity of coal than has been habitual in the past those facilities will be correspondingly released for the heavier business of the fall and the early winter.

I need not remind Senators of the exigencies of the last year, and in fact of every year since 1917.

These are the two great objects of this bill. It will not increase the price of coal a penny to anybody. It can not increase the price of coal, in my judgment, to anyone. To say that it will increase the price of coal is to assume that the dealers are not fair, honest, conscientious business men, and that they will take advantage of an opportunity, which they, indeed, have now, but which would be continued to them under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Iowa. My attention was temporarily diverted, and I want to be sure that I did not misunderstand the first branch of the Senator's argument. Is it his belief that if the pending bill is enacted into law and carried into execution it will release 25 per cent of the miners now employed for employment elsewhere?

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. WILLIS. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The trouble is that they are not employed. That is the difficulty with the miners' situation. Roughly speaking, there are 25 per cent more men gathered around the coal mines of the United States and employed from time to time than are necessary to produce the coal which the American people consume. I said that it would enable 25 per cent of that number to seek other employment in which they could be continuously employed, and it would leave the proper number continuously at work 275 or 300 days in the year.

Mr. WILLIS. In other words, instead of requiring 762,000 men to mine the coal, as is the case now, it would require only about 572,000, practically 200,000 less?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my opinion.

Mr. WILLIS. I want to ask the Senator one more question. He heard the statement made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] to the effect that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in his opinion, now have the authority proposed to be granted by the bill. Does the Senator from Iowa concur in that view?

Mr. CUMMINS. I commented on that during the course of my observations.

Mr. WILLIS. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe the commission has the authority to do this thing, and I tried to explain why the commission thought it had not the authority. Did the Senator from Ohio hear my contention in that regard?

Mr. WILLIS. No; I regret I did not hear the Senator, but I do not ask him to repeat it, because I can read it in the RECORD. To what extent is that power now exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I know, it has never been exercised against the voluntary proposal of the railroad companies. The commission has, as I understand it, approved what may be called seasonal rates, and has authorized railroad companies to charge less at one time in the year than they were permitted to charge at another time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I attempted to give the reasons of the Interstate Commerce Commission for desiring that they be granted these powers and the opinion of the chairman that at the present time they do not have the powers. I quote from a letter of Chairman Clark in relation to this; and I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Ohio, because thrice he has asked a question as to whether the commission now has power to fix seasonal rates. The chairman has written me as follows:

> With regard to the commission's powers to prescribe seasonal rates, I have to say that we do not think that we have any powers to adjust rates for the purpose of securing or bringing about certain economic or industrial conditions which might appeal to our judgment. We think that our powers are to deal with the rates in the light of transportation considerations, with a view to avoiding or eliminating undue preference or prejudice and unjust discrimination as between persons or firms, localities or commodities. Our understanding of the purpose of the seasonal coal rate bill in which you are interested is that it recognizes a public interest and contemplates encouraging consumers to purchase their supplies in larger measure during the summer months, when the demand for coal is usually light and when the railroads have more than ample facilities with which to move it. We do not understand that it contemplates that this inducement shall take the form of reduced rates during the summer season wholly at the expense of the carriers, but that it shall be fairly compensated for in the rates applicable during the other months; in other words, that the total amount paid for transportation of coal shall be more evenly distributed over the months of the year without substantially affecting in this way the aggregate revenue of the carriers from this traffic.

In answer to the other question of the Senator—as to the situation regarding the seasonal rates which have been fixed by the carriers and, I understand, too, by the commission, for lake transportation of coal—the chairman of the commission has written me as follows:

> You asked me to write you the facts in connection with the recent reduction in rates on coal to the Lake Erie ports when for transshipment by water beyond. You also asked my view as to the powers now vested in the commission to require seasonal rates on coal, with a view to inducing a larger movement during the summer season, thus relieving the situation during the late fall and winter months, when the demand is heavy and transportation difficulties more severe.
>
> A large volume of coal moves each year from Ohio, western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Kentucky to Lake Erie ports, and thence by water to points on the Great Lakes. Large volumes of this coal are handled by dock companies at ports on the west bank of Lake Michigan and on Lake Superior, who distribute it among consumers at the ports and at inland points.
>
> At a comparatively short distance from the docks this coal comes in competition with coal moving all rail from Indiana and Illinois mines. There is a large area in northern Iowa, southern Minnesota, eastern South Dakota, southeastern North Dakota, and western Wisconsin in which this competition is keen.
> When the Director General of Railroads increased rates in July, 1918, the increases on coal were made in cents per ton, the increases being graduated according to the volume of the rate and being made applicable to each separate rate. The coal moving to the Lake Erie ports for movement by water has a rail rate to the port, and if it is distributed from Lake Michigan or Lake Superior ports via rail it, of course, has an additional or another rail rate. Both of those rail rates were increased while the single joint rate on all-rail coal from Illinois or Indiana had but one increase. The same thing occurred again when rates were increased generally in 1920, and necessarily these changes in rates worked to the disadvantage of the lake cargo coal and to the advantage of the all-rail coal.
> The movement of coal via water from the Lake Erie ports amounts to from 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 tons per year, and that, of course, must move during the open season of navigation. It is highly desirable, therefore, that the movement shall begin early and continue throughout the season. It is an attractive traffic for the railroads because the cars that go to the Lake Erie ports loaded with coal are loaded back to the iron-producing districts with iron ore. Boats that bring down iron ore take back cargoes of coal. The eastern railroads, therefore, have in this a rather ideal situation of a well-balanced tonnage.
> In the early part of the present season of navigation the movement of lake cargo coal was negligible. The eastern operators insisted that under the then existing rates they could not sell or move lake cargo coal, and they convinced the traffic representatives of the railroads that unless the rate to the Lake Erie ports was reduced there would be no movement during the earlier months of the season of navigation and probably but little movement during the later months.

In other words, the operators themselves are begging for seasonal freight rates in order that they might have a market.

The letter continues:

> As a result of this the railroads voluntarily put in the reduced rates on coal to the Lake Erie ports, the reduction being 28 cents per ton and the rates being initially applicable only on coal destined to west bank Lake Michigan ports north of the Illinois-Wisconsin State line and to Lake Superior ports west of Whitefish Point. The carriers' application for authority to establish these rates on short notice was granted by us.

There are three conceivable places where that 21,000,000 tons might be stored. At first thought one would say store it at the mines, but mine storage is practically nonexistent in the United States. If we are going to store coal at the mines, the cheapest place is underground in the bed, and in any case mine storage would not solve the question of the seasonal load on the transportation system, which is, after all, the one that concerns me most. The fuel troubles of the past five years have been primarily due to inability to deliver coal, and seldom to inability to mine it.

The second place where the 21,000,000 tons might be stored is at some intermediate point, after the manner of the coal on the Lake docks. In such a case the work of storing coal would probably be undertaken by the producer or distributor rather than by the consumer, as is the case with the storage yards operated by the anthracite producers. It is to be remembered, however, that intermediate storage is not likely to be possible, except at some natural breaking point in the movement from mine to consumer, and the possibilities of its application to bituminous coal do not appear to be great. Moreover, intermediate storage will not solve the real problem of guaranteeing a reserve supply to the ultimate consumer. Something may happen to the last link in the chain of transportation, and if so, the consumer is no better off than if the coal were at the mine. Suppose, for example, that we were to ask the bituminous operators to put in storage yards somewhere en route to New England. The experience of the last few years has shown that the neck of the bottle in fueling New England is apt to be the capacity of the rail gateways over the Hudson, and simply to accumulate supplies above that bottle neck might be of little value when the need of a reserve really came.

The third place where the extra coal may be stored is in the bin of the consumer. By this I do not mean alone the cellar of the householder, but more important still, the manufacturing establishment or the public-utility plant. I am fully aware of the fact that the storage of some types of soft coal present technical difficulties, such as the danger of spontaneous combustion. The weight of expert opinion, however, is that with the proper precaution, even Middle Western coals can be stored successfully. What we must do is to spread among users of coal knowledge of the technique of storage, and that is one of the things provided for in the companion bill, Senate 1807. I realize, too, that storage requires space, and that space is not available at all plants.

But, to my mind, the great sweeping answer to these objections that storage is difficult or impracticable is that many thousands of consumers do store coal already; that the quantity normally in storage in the late fall is probably over 30,000,000 tons, if not well up to 40,000,000 tons, and that we know by actual count that on the day of the armistice consumers had on hand 63,000,000 tons of coal, much of it, by the way, Illinois, Indiana, or other western coal. The extra 21,000,000 tons which must be stored in the summer to equalize output, when added to the quantity already stored, would not exceed that figure of 63,000,000 tons, which actually has been stored already. What was done by the consumers during the war can be done again, and will be done if only storage is made financially attractive to them.

Many a public-utility or industrial plant has learned through its bitter experience of the last five years that a coal pile is as necessary a part of the insurance of its plant as a fire insurance policy. I know and you know of cases where facilities for storage have been installed recently with no other inducement than providing that insurance. But it is only fair to the consumer that some financial encouragement be offered him to offset the cost of storage. That is exactly what this bill proposes. If 50 cents a ton, the summer discount in the price of domestic anthracite, has been a material factor in moving anthracite in the summer time, as the anthracite producers will agree it has been, I think we can look forward to a 50-cent differential in freight, tending to produce the same result in bituminous coal.

SEASONAL COAL RATES ARE THE ONLY PRACTICABLE MEANS AT HAND TO ENCOURAGE STORAGE.

I hear some one retort, "Well, if the summer discount in the price of anthracite has been effective in stimulating the summer demand for hard coal, why not apply the same idea to soft coal? Let the bituminous operators offer a summer price." The answer is that what has been possible in the way of stabilized prices in the close-knit anthracite industry would not be possible in the highly competitive bituminous industry. In the anthracite field eight railroad affiliated companies control 75 per cent of the output, and secure from any effective competition they have been able to announce prices in advance and to adhere to those circular prices. But I for one would be afraid to see any general agreement among bituminous operators to offer seasonal discounts in mine prices of bituminous coal, because that would involve the building up of a gigantic soft-coal trust. Some far-seeing bituminous operators have imitated the anthracite producers' practice of announcing summer discount prices, chiefly on domestic coals. Such an operator is the McAlester Fuel Co., of McAlester, Okla.; but I am informed by the president of that company, Mr. J. G. Puterbaugh, that purchasers of coal are inclined to doubt the certainty of the financial saving offered by the summer price. They are afraid the market will jump the other way. They want something that is guaranteed, something that they can bank on. Although the McAlester Fuel Co. has found its summer prices of great practical value in stimulating the summer movement of its coal, Mr. Puterbaugh is an earnest advocate of seasonal freight rates. There can be no doubt in the consumer's mind as to the financial saving to be involved under a system of seasonal rates. It is laid down in black and white before him, and announced for months in advance.

Let me make clear that the bill as drafted is not an attempt to revise downward the general level of coal rates. That is a separate subject which the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission are already ample to cover. The present bill specifically directs that seasonal rates shall be so adjusted that the increases in the fall and winter months shall compensate for the decreases in the spring and summer months, in order that the total revenue to the carriers from the transportation of coal shall remain approximately the same.

I am also fully aware of the fact that a set of seasonal differentials in rates which would be applicable to conditions in Illinois might not be applicable to conditions in the Appalachian region. The bill in its present form leaves it to the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission to apply the principle of seasonal rates in one district and not in another, and to vary the differentials from one district to another in order to meet the needs. The procedure of the commission under the act as passed would doubtless be to investigate carefully the normal seasonal variation in coal shipment for each rate group or coal-producing district, and to fit the remedy to the condition disclosed.

SEASONAL COAL RATES ARE NEEDED TO HELP THE COAL INDUSTRY ITSELF.

The most obvious sufferers from the irregularity of the demand for coal are the men engaged in mining it. It is common knowledge that the miner's year is highly intermittent, but I doubt if our people realize how great the irregularity is. During the last 30 years, out of 308 potential working days in the year, the bituminous mines of this country spent an average of 93 days in idleness and worked only 215 days. That 215 days is the measure of the opportunity to labor offered to the mine worker by the industry. Moreover, the condition is not improving. In 1919 the total number of working days lost was 111, of which only 36 were attributable to the great strike. The year 1920 will also show up poorly when the final returns are in. In 1921, according to the weekly reports of the Geological Survey, the mines have been working in most districts only two or three days a week.

To visualize the extent of these losses of working time, diagram No. 3 in the book of charts will be helpful. It shows that in the long run the mines have lost unavoidably because of the seasonal character of demand some 44 working days per year. But so great is the mine capacity in the bituminous industry that even were the mines to work steadily during the year they could not be kept continuously employed. Some 34 days are lost each year through sheer overdevelopment of the industry. There are so many mines and so many miners that there is simply not enough work to go around. Add to this an allowance for the effect of business depression in reducing consumption, which, absent in some years and present in others, count on the average for perhaps 15 lost working days in the year and the total time idle is 93 days, or 30 per cent of the working year.

Fancy yourself a coal miner and subject to these irregularities of employment. You know by experience that you can hardly hope to work much over 200 days in the year. You know that there will be weeks or months in the summer when you can work but one or two days a week. You know that it is never possible for you to tell in advance whether cars will be furnished the mine to-morrow or not. When the miners asked for a six-hour day and a five-day week—a total of 30 working hours per week—they were asking for a recognition by agreement of the working time that is in fact offered them. For the average number of hours worked per week from the day of the armistice to November 1, 1919, when the miners went on strike, according to records furnished the Geological Survey by the coal operators, was exactly 30 hours per week. Of course, we do not want to crystallize this bad situation into a permanent arrangement by agreeing that the working week shall be limited to anything like 30 hours, but I can sympathize with the position of the coal miner. I do not wonder that such irregular employment creates in him irregular habits. I imagine that it is a primary cause of the tremendous labor turnover complained of by the operator. If seasonal freight rates will do anything to stabilize the working year for the 625,000 men who work in our bituminous mines, this bill will have been worth while.

So much for the effects of intermittent operation on the mine worker. Its effects on the mine owner are scarcely less serious. It adds to his administrative problem by creating discontent among his men; it causes undue depreciation of his mine during periods of idleness; and it very greatly increases his costs per ton. If the mine is designed to produce 1,000 tons per day and has orders sufficient for only 500 tons, each one of those 500 tons must bear twice as much of the overhead expenses, including fixed charges, as if the mine were working to capacity.

Nor is the public without interest in the condition of the miners and owners. After all, the public has to pay the bill. It has to pay prices high enough to support the labor and capital engaged in the industry for the 93 working days they are idle as well as for the 215 working days they are active. As Director Smith, of the Geological Survey, has aply put it, the number of man days of enforced idleness in bituminous coal mining in this country is equivalent to maintaining a standing army as large as the Secretary of War is now asking for. It is as large as the man days involved in giving every young man who comes of military age in the year three months of military training.

Our coal industry has become so used to this condition that we do not realize how much worse it is in the United States than in the other principal coal-mining countries. For example, as diagram No. 2 in the booklet of charts shows, the number of days worked at bituminous mines in the United States in 1913 averaged 232, as against 280 in Nova Scotia, 289 in France, 290 in the United Kingdom, 298 in Belgium, and 317 in Prussia. These are the countries that are our principal competitors in the export coal trade. Our costs are much lower than theirs in respect to many items, but they are much higher than theirs in respect to the element of steadiness of operation. Some light on the reason for this poor showing of our mines in comparison with those of other countries is given in diagram 11 of the book of charts. From that diagram it will be seen that in England, our chief competitor, the seasonal character of demand has been practically overcome.

But we do not need to go outside our own country to prove that the problem of seasonal operation of coal mines can be solved. The anthracite industry of Pennsylvania has so improved its working time through summer-price discounts and other devices that it now compares not unfavorably with the industry in England.

SEASONAL COAL RATES ARE NEEDED TO RELIEVE THE TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM.

The railroads, especially those of the Mississippi Valley, suffer from this irregular character of the demand for coal almost as much as do the mines. The large wall chart [wall chart No. 1] shows how the monthly revenues of the carriers have fluctuated up and down with the monthly production of soft coal in the last eight years. Of course, soft coal is not the only seasonal commodity, but it is a significant fact that the heaviest demand for coal-carrying equipment comes at the very season of the year when the crop movement is heavy, namely, the late fall. Look again, if you please, at the curve of monthly coal production in Illinois [wall chart No. 2; also diagram 5 in blue booklet] and imagine yourself president of the Illinois Central Railroad, asked to provide transportation to haul the coal offered in times of peak demand. If you buy cars enough and engines enough to handle 9,000,000 tons per month on occasions, what can you possibly do with those cars and engines when the output drops to three or two million tons or fades away to nothing at all? I suspect that the capital investment in coal-carrying equipment is at least equal to the capital investment in coal mining, and it is nationally just as important to keep that railroad equipment working regularly through the year as it is to keep the mining equipment uniformly occupied.

There has been some criticism of the inability of the carriers to deliver coal as rapidly as it is called for by the public. I wonder if you realize the difficulties of the task that has confronted them. The tables of weekly output appended by the Geological Survey to the booklet of charts which lies before each of you show that the railroads have frequently had to furnish transportation for a weekly output of 12,800,000 tons, and occasionally for 13,000,000 tons of coal. But in the dull season the tonnage offered them has dropped to 6,000,000 tons, and once during the coal strike in 1919 it fell off to less than 4,000,000 tons. Perhaps it is unfair to take the extreme conditions of the coal strike as an example, but there are plenty of illustrations without considering the most extreme cases. Take the last three years. In 1919, when the only thing limiting production was lack of orders, the output of soft coal fell to 7,378,000 tons a week. Later in the year, when the consumers realized their mistake and tried to accumulate a safe reserve as they saw the strike coming, the production rose to 13,140,000 tons a week. This was an increase of more than 78 per cent in seven months. Again, in the fall of 1920, the railroads were called on to furnish transportation for 12,865,000 tons in one week—the week ended December 11. Five months later the output had dropped to 5,822,000 tons—the week ended April 2, 1921.

No business can function economically under a demand so irregular as this. In view of the present physical condition of the railroads, it is absolutely essential that something be done to equalize the burden of coal traffic. Before the war our transportation system had no serious difficulty in handling the coal offered, even with the peaks and valleys of seasonal variation in demand. We must remember, however, that in those days the country needed less than 500,000,000 tons of soft coal a year. Now, when business is active, our national requirements, including coal for export, are in the neighborhood of 530,000,000 tons. There has been no corresponding growth in the capacity of the railroads to transport coal, and on the three occasions when we have called upon them to haul 550,000,000 tons of soft coal in the year the carriers have shown signs of distress. In 1917, 1918, and again in 1920, years in which the output of bituminous coal exceeded 550,000,000 tons, the carriers were able to handle the burden only by being relieved from the responsibility of carrying other types of traffic. As Mr. Gutheim, of the American Railway Association, has pointed out—

> Our railroad facilities are probably adequate to-day to handle our necessary annual bituminous output, if produced with fair uniformity of rate throughout the year, and will certainly be adequate when post-war rehabilitation of the properties is completed. Our railroad facilities are not, and without great waste of investment never can be, adequate to handle currently our necessary bituminous-coal production when obtained by weekly peaks of 13,000,000 tons, and valleys of 7,500,000 tons, in a 12-month period, as has been the case in the past two years.

If Mr. Gutheim is right, some means must be found to spread the burden of coal traffic more equally over the year.

Now, evening up the traffic to be handled on a railroad is essentially the same problem as evening up the demand for power and light at an electric utility plant. One of the constant problems of the public utility is to improve what the engineer calls the "load factor." So the utility offers special concessions in rates to users of power who can avoid the peak hours and take their current in the hours of low demand. Conversely, the utility charges a premium on the current used during the peak hours. Seasonal coal freight rates are simply the same idea applied to railroad transportation. While the carrier will get less for the ton-miles of hauling done during the months of discount, it will get proportionately more for the ton-miles hauled in other months, and the total receipts will be the same. On the other hand, its efficiency of operation will be greatly improved and it will be enabled to handle a larger volume of freight, because it works more continuously. Once more the plant with the high load factor will score over the plant with the bad load factor.

SEASONAL COAL RATES ARE NEEDED TO BUILD UP ADEQUATE RESERVE STOCKS FOR THE PROTECTION OF THE PUBLIC.

My interest in this bill, however, lies not primarily in providing regular work for the mines or in relieving the rush demand upon the transportation system. As a representative of a coal-consuming State, my primary interest is to see that something is done to protect the consumer of coal against a runaway market or against an actual shortage of coal. I think that the way to do that is to build up and to maintain a reserve in the hands of consumers large enough so that no probable interruption to supply, whether it comes from traffic congestion on the railroads or from a mine strike, can force the consumers to go out and pay the coal man any price that that man's conscience will let him charge. We have had bitter experience of what happens when reserve stocks of coal fall below the point of safety. Lack of sufficient storage or poor distribution of the coal in storage was the cause of these mountain peaks of price shown in the curve of the large wall chart. [Wall chart I, red line.] On this point I think that the coal trade and the thinking men among the coal consumers are in agreement. So long as the quantity of coal in storage is large, consumers can bide their time. They can withstand a traffic jam, delaying the delivery of loaded coal. If prices asked are exceessively high, they can wait and rely on contract deliveries. But once let stocks fall below the danger point and conditions are ripe for a panicky market. When a consumer like a public utility, which must keep going at all costs, runs out of coal he must practically take the producer's terms in obtaining a supply to tide him over the emergency. Now, our people are not in the habit of holding the large reserves which experience has taught us they need.

A few days of extraordinarily severe winter weather in December, 1917, and January, 1918, resulting in a temporary blockade of the railroads in the Northeast, caught a great many users of coal unprepared and unprotected. The price at the time was under control, but no one needs to be reminded of the bitter experiences and the industrial losses resulting from the shutting down of plants which followed. Again, when the miners struck in the fall of 1919 the power behind their strike resulted from the fact that the consumers of coal had used up their wartime reserves. Consumers had been burning their stock piles instead of buying coal to maintain their stock piles, and the result was that even with the nonunion fields working to capacity, stocks of coal were exhausted in six weeks' time and a settlement became absolutely imperative. At the end of that time stocks in the industrial Northeast, in territory north of the Ohio and Potomac and east of the Mississippi, had been eaten down to the bone, and reports of distress and the closing down of plants began to come in from many quarters.

But if you wish to see the effect of depleted stocks in producing a panicky market at its worst, look at the curve of spot price in the season of 1920. [Wall chart No. 1; also diagram 14 in booklet.] When the Government withdrew its control of prices on April 1, 1920, stocks had not recovered from the strike and were still dangerously low. If the railroads had been running smoothly, it is probable that the reserves could have been built up again without undue rise in price. But on the very day that the Government control of prices was lifted the railway switchmen's strike broke. Traffic was seriously interrupted, and many consumers experienced delays in getting delivery on coal. The result was that they had to bid against one another and the panic demand forced prices up to the highest level ever known. The average spot price of all bituminous coals, according to Coal Age, in the month of August, 1920, was over $9 a ton f. o. b. mine. To appreciate what that meant, suppose we think of it in terms of the prewar price. If the 1913 spot price be represented by the index number 100, then the index for August, 1920, would be 730. In justice to the coal men it must be pointed out that most of the tonnage continued to move under contract and was not affected by these extraordinary spot prices. The $9 price did, however, represent what the unwary and unprotected consumer had to pay for emergency coal. The extraordinary foreign demand for export overseas prevailing at that time was no doubt a factor in the high prices, but it was only a contributing factor. We should have had high prices had there been no foreign demand, because stocks were dangerously low and because current delivery could not be made by the railroads fast enough to supply all the emergency coal. Conversely, had stocks been large, traffic jams resulting from the switchmen's strike would have had little effect on prices, because consumers could have relied upon their reserves for a period instead of being forced to enter the spot market and buy on the producers' terms.

These facts point indisputably to the conclusion that the tone of the coal market is very largely determined by the state of consumers' stocks; that the surest way to create a sellers' market, a market in which anything that is black goes, and in which the producer can name his own terms, is to let stocks fall below the danger point. If, on the contrary, the reserves can be kept comfortably large, the possibility of a panic demand is practically eliminated. The market will then become a buyers' market, such as generally prevailed in this country before the war. Our great mine capacity, our enormous underground resources of soft coal, are such that competition can be trusted to keep down the price when only 10,000,000 or 11,000,000 tons a week are being asked for. Let the weekly demand rise to 12,000,000 or 13,000,000 tons, and the railroads are likely to show signs of distress, deliveries will be interrupted or delayed, and the condition is ripe for another sellers' market. I have dwelt at some length on the necessity of maintaining a large reserve stock of coal as a protection to the consumer against extortionate prices, because it seems to me the strongest argument in favor of the seasonal rate bill. If the bill accomplishes its purpose and encourages general storage by the consumer, it will do more to bring about reasonable prices of coal than all the machinery of Government regulation can do.

SEASONAL RATES ARE NEEDED AT ONCE TO SPEED UP THE MOVEMENT OF COAL FOR NEXT WINTER.

It is my intention to press this bill for immediate passage in the hope that it can become a law in time to be used as a means of stimulating the movement of coal in the present season. I do not wish to assume the rôle of an alarmist nor to predict a scarcity of fuel in the near future, for we should be inexcusably negligent should such a shortage develop under present conditions. The facts as to current production as revealed by the Geological Survey's weekly coal report are such, however, as to give food for thought. Do you realize that the cumulative output of soft coal for the year up to June 1 was 69,000,000 tons behind 1918 and 51,000,000 tons behind 1920? Those years were, of course, years of active business, when consumption was greater than at present; but in comparison with 1919, a year of business depression, and a year when the carry over from the preceding winter was enormous, the present season was 14,000,000 tons behind on June 1. That fact is disquieting to me. I am not greatly reassured to note that the cumulative output this year is slightly in excess of that for the corresponding period of 1915, because, while the present business depression is more serious than that of 1914 and early 1915, our normal increase in consumption is so great that we should expect to be using 60,000,000 tons more per year now than then.

The plain fact is—as all the coal trade knows—that the consumer is distrustful of the coal operator and dealer. The consumer figures that miners' wages and freight rates are coming down. Consumers, as a class, with the exception of the public utilities, have in consequence been drawing heavily on their stock piles. Up to April 1 the draft on storage had not proceeded far enough to lower the reserve below the danger point. The Geological Survey's canvass of consumers' stocks showed the total in storage on April 1 as about 37,000,000 tons. It is clear, however, that the draft on storage must have continued since then; and at present, in my opinion, stocks are getting too low for safety. The passage of this bill and the definite announcement of a seasonal cut in coal freight rates, to be followed at a specified date in the autumn by a restoration of the present rate, would clarify the situation greatly. It would put an end to speculation as to what is going to happen to the transportation cost of coal and would result in the placing of thousands of orders at the mines. I do not wish to prophesy an impending shortage of cars, but there have been plenty of railroad executives to sound that note of warning if the purchase of coal be longer delayed. This much is perfectly clear: That if business revives suddenly, and we attempt to reaccumulate stocks of coal, take care of current consumption, and handle other commodities calling for open-top equipment, we shall have a repetition of the situation in 1920, with the railroads unable to handle all the traffic. Under these circumstances, the need for prompt action on this seasonal rates bill and for immediate application of the principle as soon as the bill becomes a law is urgent. Let us get part of the year's transportation task out of the way while we have idle cars waiting for something to do, and have the cars available for handling other traffic when the revival of business comes.

The coal industry represents the most important transportation problem before the railroads of this country, the following comparison of coal tonnage compared with the tonnage of other basic commodities setting out this situation very clearly:

	Net tons.
Anthracite coal	98,826,084
Bituminous coal	579,385,820
Total coal	678,211,904

Relative weight compared with coal.

	Net tons.	Per cent.
Farm products: Wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, and potatoes	163,176,206	24.0
Lumber: All grades	63,780,988	9.4
Basic metals: Steel, copper, lead, zinc	51,829,281	7.6
Total	278,786,567	41.0

It will be observed that the transportation of all farm products, all the lumber, and all the basic metals requires a tonnage movement approximating 41 per cent of that required to move the anthracite and bituminous coal, the figures shown above covering the calendar year 1918, no later tonnage figures obtainable—the ratio no doubt holding relatively uniform.

The bituminous coal produced by the mines of this country for eight years—1913 to 1920, inclusive—with the production for the first five calendar months of 1921 and the tonnage that must be produced and transported in the remaining seven months of the calendar year, if we are to produce 499,010,000 tons in 1921, is set forth in certain figures which I have here. I ask unanimous consent that these figures be inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Annual fluctuations in the production of anthracite coal.

[This table shows that anthracite production, except during the war years, 1917 and 1918, when a large amount of coal was reclaimed from the culm banks, is practically stationary at 90,000,000 tons a year. Bituminous production, on the other hand, fluctuates sharply.]

	Net tons.
1913	92,000,000
1914	91,000,000
1915	89,000,000
1916	88,000,000
1917	100,000,000
1918	99,000,000
1919	88,000,000
1920	89,000,000
1921 to May 28	37,600,000

The bituminous coal production and requirements of the country have been as follows:

	Tons.
1913	478,435,297
1914	422,703,970
1915	442,624,426
1916	502,519,682
1917	551,790,563
1918	579,385,820
1919	458,063,000
1920	556,563,000
Average, 8 years	499,010,000
Production Jan. 1 to May 31, 1921	153,821,000
To be produced June 1 to Dec. 31	345,189,000
Average production per month first five months	30,764,200
Average production required next seven months	49,312,714

Increase in rate of production required, 60 per cent.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The question arises as to whether or not the country, with industries largely idle, will require 499,000,000 tons of soft coal this year. I am of the opinion that due consideration should be given to the fact that the existing bituminous wage scale is extraordinarily high and must be reduced with the expiration of same on March 31 next—the anthracite wage scale expiring simultaneously with the bituminous scale—and with the further belief that such adjustment will not be made without protracted controversy I am confident that a suspension of more or less duration will take effect. That such should happen is unfortunate, even discreditable, to the conduct of our coal affairs, but I do not believe that either the coal operators or mine workers have been educated out of the method of adjudicating their differences which has been in force ever since the inception of the United Mine Workers' organization.

During the months in which I have urged the theory of constructive legislation more or less objection has been made to same by the coal operators of the country. In a general way the majority are adverse to putting the industry on a stable basis. To be frank, many of them prefer the existing condition, believing that with the present excess development more money can be made over a period of years as the industry is now conducted than would accrue from steadier operation and fewer mines.

I believe the greatest obstacle that stands in the way of national progress to-day is our extraordinary economic waste, waste of natural resources, waste of energy, and the unalterable solution lies in an improvement of the load factor.

We must indorse the theory of a more uniform operation of the coal mines of the country; when this is done we have contributed to the more uniform operation of the railroads. What is wanted to-day is a sufficient number of men in high place who will say that the load factor of the railroads must be improved and the extraordinary seasonal variations in the industrial machine must be modified where elimination is not possible.

The outstanding feature of all opposition to this bill that has come to my attention is that such is based on the individual interest of the producer and without regard whatever to—

(a) The extraordinary tax levied on the consumer, who pays the bill.

(b) The extraordinary tax levied on the transportation resources of the country, the cost of which must also be met by the consumer.

(c) The total indifference to the instability of employment suffered by the mine worker, which has led to demands in extraordinary wage increases, enforced in turn by strikes, costing the country millions and actually menacing our Government.

On November 20 a meeting of the coal committee appointed by the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, Herbert Hoover, chairman, consisting of men who were capable of holding themselves apart from the commercial situation, the following recommendations of the committee, including seasonal freight rates, is summed up in the following statement:

That the bituminous industry, by the nature of its organization, functions economically in a too inefficient manner. Employment in the industry averages 220 days per annum, with a minimum district average of less than 200.

Thus a labor staff and capital investment of fully 30 per cent more is required than would otherwise be necessary. From this flows a high daily wage, a considerable portion of the just complaints of labor, and a higher cost of coal to the consumer.

The causes are very largely (a) intermittency in seasonal demand, (b) irregularity of car supplies, (c) lack of storage facilities and incentive for their use.

The cure lies in (a) the cooperation of railroads in the establishment of seasonal differentials in rates that will induce summer demand. (b) Increased transportation facilities and a more efficient and equitable distribution of cars. (c) An increased use of central and interconnected electric power stations. (d) A lower selling price in dull seasons, made possible by differentials in profits, freight rates, and wages. (e) A recognition by the larger consumers, such as Federal, State, and municipal institutions, railroads, public utilities, and industrial plants that not only continuity of operation, but also the safety of the public, demands that they provide adequate storage to be replenished in the dull seasons.

Such storage is feasible and can be made financially remunerative by differential rates and prices. Public safety demands the installation of storage facilities at the place of consumption.

No adequate solution can be found except through organized cooperation of the operators, labor, railroads, and large consumers. Under existing laws as to combinations such cooperation can not be carried on. Therefore we believe that some Federal legislation is necessary permitting such cooperation under competent Government authority.

In addition to the broadest possible educational informative program (which is distinctly the work of the Federal Government), in so far as collecting and publishing general statistical information is concerned, seasonal prices and seasonal freight rates as applied not only to coal, but possibly other commodities, will go farthest in the direction of bringing this condition about.

The attitude of the coal men and the railroad men has very largely been reactionary, neither class having offered a single constructive suggestion in the past two years—they are committed to the theory of maintaining the condition status quo.

The committee believes that legislation of this character, authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to initiate lower freight rates on coal during the spring and summer months and higher rates during the fall and winter months will tend to encourage consumers to develop storage accommodations, to accept deliveries of coal in advance of their seasonal needs, and thus to keep the mines operating more constantly throughout the year.

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert a certain marked portion of the report of the committee on seasonal coal rates as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

* * * The committee is of the opinion that such legislation will bring about the following beneficial results:

1. It will stabilize the price of coal. The capacity output of all the coal mines in the United States, assuming fairly constant operation, would far exceed the present consumption. The output of all these mines working as at present only intermittently during the spring and summer months and working to capacity during the fall and winter months is barely sufficient to supply the current needs and the greatly increased cold-weather demand for coal. During the winter the demand so nearly equals the currently available supply that scarcity prices prevail. In addition to this the actual cost of production per ton is unduly enhanced because the operator must during the time his mine is closed down or working intermittently keep together his organization and expend money for the upkeep and maintenance of the property, all of which must be added to the price of the coal which he mines and sells during the rush season. If the demand for coal were reasonably constant throughout the year, many of these costs based on holding plant, capital, and personnel idle for a large portion of the time would disappear, and the price of coal would more nearly represent only current costs of production plus a reasonable profit, leaving no opportunity for charging scarcity prices during the months when the greatest amount of coal is consumed. The situation is somewhat analogous to that which prevails in the electric-lighting industry, where the rate of 10 or 12 cents per kilowatt hour charged for current used for lighting includes a large allowance for machinery kept idle throughout the daytime and only employed to handle the peak load in the evening, while the same current is sold for heating purposes at 3 or 4 cents per kilowatt hour because its use throughout the day for this purpose tends to keep all of the power-house machinery operating more constantly.

2. Such legislation will obviate very largely the pressing necessity for more coal cars. The present supply of coal cars, while totally insufficient to handle the fall and winter rush under existing conditions, would be fairly adequate to carry all the coal desired by consumers if this equipment could be kept moving with greater regularity throughout the year, as would be the case if the advantage of lower summer and spring freight rates could be held out to induce consumers to receive coal shipments in advance of their winter needs. Under the present system thousands of coal cars ordinarily lie idle during the spring and summer, while the whole available supply of coal cars is entirely insufficient to handle the fall and winter emergency.

3. Such legislation would remedy the present inadequacy of terminal facilities. The large amount of coal which must now be transported within a comparatively short time in each year tends to glut already overcrowded terminals. The increasing inability of existing terminal facilities to handle extraordinary seasonal demands without entailing serious delays and disproportionate terminal costs is one of the most glaring weaknesses in the present American railroad transportation system, according to the testimony of Chairman Clark of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

4. Such a measure would promote regularity of employment in the mines, and would thus settle most of the outstanding grievances of the miners. Increased compensation for miners is demanded not so much as an actual wage for work performed but rather as a pension for periods of enforced idleness due to the seasonal demand for coal.

The committee finds, from an examination of some of the disadvantages which might appear to inhere in the requirements of lower spring and summer freight rates for coal shipments, that most of these objections are untenable:

1. The revenues of the carriers would not be affected. A large amount of coal would still have to be mined and shipped in fall and winter to consumers who lacked the capital, credit, foresight, or storage accommodations to enable them to secure their supply during the warmer months.

2. The transportation of more coal in the spring and summer will not embarrass the railroads in handling other seasonal movements, e. g., crops. In some localities cars carrying grain are loaded only in one direction, returning empty to the point of origin because of lack of shipments moving in that direction.

If coal could be encouraged to move at the same time, this wasteful practice of hauling empty cars might be at least partially eliminated. Operating conditions during the clear weather of the spring and summer months are much more favorable, so that railroads can better withstand heavy demands for transportation at that period of the year than during the fall and winter months when coal has heretofore moved in greatest volume. The cost to the railroads of transporting coal is also much less in warm weather, when locomotives can haul heavier trains, when they consume less fuel, and when fewer employees can handle more traffic.

3. The acquisition of more coal cars does not afford a practicable and complete remedy for existing difficulties. Under the transportation act the Interstate Commerce Commission is given the power to require carriers to provide themselves with sufficient cars. But most of the railroads have neither the money nor the credit with which to buy a supply of coal cars adequate for current needs under the present system of large seasonal shipments, so it would be useless for the commission to order them to purchase this equipment. On the other hand, most of the railroads which have enough money or credit to finance such purchases already possess an adequate number of coal cars to care for the needs of their own patrons, and they could not reasonably be required by the commission to purchase additional cars to take care of the traffic of other lines.

4. It may be urged that the interstate commerce act now contains ample provisions to permit the commission or the carrier to institute lower summer freight rates for coal. The conclusive answer to this contention is that, during the many years that the same provisions have been law, this practice has never been introduced. The commission does not believe that it possesses the power to require the establishment of such seasonal rates on coal. It has never attempted to exercise this power, and its chairman states that it does not contemplate doing so in the future in the absence of further legislation. The commission assumes that, in prescribing rates and practices, it is not empowered to initiate new systems of rate making, designed principally to remedy general economic situations. It feels that this should be the subject of specific legislative authorization.

* * * * * * *

The committee realizes, of course, that the feasibility and effectiveness of the proposed legislation depends very largely upon the practicability of storing coal in large and small quantities. It therefore solicited and received a large amount of testimony from such experts as George Otis Smith, Director of the Geological Survey, various coal operators, and from coal dealers on this point. As a result of this testimony and from information secured through correspondence, the committee entertains no doubt whatever but what practically every kind of coal mined in the United States can be stored safely, conveniently, and cheaply. The tonnage of coal produced which can not be stored satisfactorily is almost negligible. The committee is of the opinion that most of the testimony advanced to cast a doubt on the feasibility of storing coal is based almost uniformly on a disinclination to change the present hand-to-mouth policy under which the country now obtains its coal, scarcely knowing one day whether the next day's supply of coal will be available or not. It feels that this ultraconservative attitude, in the face of constantly recurring coal famines, bringing unemployment and possible starvation in their wake, is entirely unwarranted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, in closing I wish to say that it requires no argument to show that freight can be moved in the summer months in this climate at less cost than in the winter months. It is also self-apparent that less coal is required in summer months than in winter months. Because of the latter fact there is greater demand for coal in winter than in summer, and if Congress gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to take such facts into consideration and to differentiate between summer and winter in fixing the rates, the tendency undoubtedly will be to stabilize the industry because men at the mines and the men engaged in the handling of coal can then be employed practically all the year round rather than steadily during certain months and only spasmodically during the rest of the year.

Senate bill 1807 is therefore properly designated as a bill to stabilize the industry—I am speaking of the other bill which I have introduced—because its object is to secure information which will bring about a distribution of coal movement practically throughout the entire year rather than in great quantities during a few months in winter and in small quantities during the balance of the year. The objections of the bituminous coal operators are mainly that the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to secure information of "such intimate details of private business as costs and profits," and to make "recommendations for further legislation relating to mining, distribution, transportation, or sale of coal as they may deem necessary."

The primary purpose of the bill is to stabilize the industry and to secure all information necessary for that purpose. No information is more important than the cost of the coal and the profits which the operators are making. In ascertaining the cost, I assume that the Secretary of Commerce and the director would secure the cost for the different months, and, as coal is a prime necessity, if it was found that it could be mined at a lower rate in summer than in winter, it would seem then the duty of the Secretary of Commerce to try in every way possible to promote shipments of coal during the summer and the purchase by consumers during the summer. To bring about such purchases and shipments the Secretary can, under section 15, call to the attention of the public the fact that coal costs less in summer than in winter. What is more, the Interstate Commerce Commission can, under Senate bill 1806, prescribe lower rates for hauling in summer than in winter. There is, of course, the possibility that publicity and differentiation in rates may not bring about stabilization of the industry and may not promote increased purchases during the summer. The Secretary of Commerce is therefore given quite properly the power to which the bituminous coal operators make objection, namely, the power to make recommendations for further legislation relating to the mining, distribution, transportation, and sale of coal. It seems to me it would be almost idle to pass the laws unless the Secretary of Commerce is given just such authority. He is to collect information, examine it, and publish summaries of it when deemed for the public good, but if this should be found insufficient, would not Congress be remiss in its duty if it did not authorize him to make recommendations based upon the information collected by him?

Congress certainly has power to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to differentiate between summer and winter rates. Incidental to that power it has the right and it is its duty to authorize the proper department to collect whatever information may be necessary so that such power will be wisely exercised. Congress, therefore, in the due exercise of its powers may bring about an assembly of facts which have a most important bearing upon a prime necessity of life. If Congress is alive to its duty to the public, it will not pigeonhole information, but will use it for the public good. I think Congress has tried to safeguard private interests because it expressly excepts the publication of information "which would separately disclose the business transactions of any person and trade secrets or names of customers." If in regulating commerce it can also at the same time bring about publicity which will be of benefit to the public, it seems to me it should do so, and the fact that it proposes to do so, instead of constituting an objection to the bill should be viewed as a reason why the bill should become law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator concludes I desire to suggest that when the Senate enters upon the consideration of the other bill referred to by him I presume the Senator will address himself more in detail to its provisions. I therefore pretermit any inquiries concerning that bill at the present time; but I wish to ask the Senator whether he would consent to an emendation of the pending bill by striking from page 2, lines 1, 2, and 3, the words "but which in the judgment of the commission will bear as nearly as may be the same annual revenue for like movement as rates without seasonal variation"?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I shall oppose such an amendment. I feel that the commission will have broad and ample powers in fixing summer rates. In other words, if we might apply the plan to the present conditions, suppose for July and August the commission should make a 25-cent reduction. Under a former plan if the commission should fix a seasonal reduction for July and August aggregating 25 cents it might gradually during the winter months increase the rates until they rose to 25 cents above the scheduled rates. Thus the commission would have the power of lowering the rates and raising them according to the season. I do not believe that the commission should be restricted in being fair to the railroads by being limited as to their power of increasing the rates. I believe, however, that if the commission should, in the exercise of their judgment, reduce the rates during the next three months it would result in the storage of a considerable quantity of coal, and, if business conditions shall improve, such storage of coal will relieve the situation.

I would object to any change in the direction suggested by the Senator from Utah, because, I will say to the Senator, I do not think the power of the commission should be restricted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I desire to say that I am not sure that I should favor the suggestion which I have made, and yet, following as best I could the argument of the Senator from New Jersey and the statement of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, I reached the conclusion that it was materially advantageous to the railroads to have their cars, which are now idle, utilized in the summer; that they could haul coal cheaper in the summer time than they could in the wintertime. It occurred to me that if that were true the railroad companies ought to be willing to haul coal at a cheaper rate now without trying to recoup for that reduction by enhancing the price in the wintertime. If it is an advantage to them to haul coal in the summer time, why should we permit the railroads to add in the wintertime whatever advantage results to the consumer by a reduction of rates in the summer time?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It would seem as if the schedule rates which are figured upon the cost of hauling coal should be reduced in the summer time, when the cost of transportation increases in winter we should at least give the railroads an additional allowance. Would it not be well to leave that to the judgment of the commission, and let them, perhaps by some kind of missionary effort, induce the railroad companies to accept a reduction now, and not increase the rates in the winter?

Mr. KING. I should be willing to have that done if I should vote for the bill, but the Senator proposes to make this mandatory and to compel the commission to add to the rates in the wintertime whatever benefits have been given to the public in the summer time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It was thought that that was fair.

Mr. KING. I confess to not having sufficient knowledge to justify an opinion which would be of any value.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. A graduated scale was first proposed, not leaving it to the judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under that proposal 5 or 10 cents a ton would be added in the winter months, up to 25 cents, and then the rates would be reduced on a graduated basis, 5, 10, 15, or 25 cents a ton during the summer months. That made a fixed differential. Congress has never entered upon fixing rates in that manner, and the older members of the committee, who had studied the question, felt that Congress should not make a departure in that direction. It was a recognized principle if the Interstate Commerce Commission were to reduce the rates for the carrying of coal in the summer that a corresponding increase in the rates should be allowed in the winter as a matter of justice to the railroads.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator's position, the plan which he is advocating now inures to the advantage of the railroads in the summer and it inures to their advantage in the winter, because it augments their charges in the wintertime. It will not, I think, benefit the domestic consumer in the summer, because he is not the one who will take advantage of it, and it will be to his disadvantage in the winter, because he will have to pay the increased freight charges.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not take that view of it.

Mr. KING. My conclusions may be wrong; I hope they are; but it occurs to me that the amendment which I have suggested is worthy of consideration.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I wish to say, in conclusion, that for two years the Committee on Interstate Commerce has made a study of this question, I being chairman of the subcommittee. I have seen conditions threatening this country that probably might have resulted, had it not been for certain preventive measures that were taken, in the people in many sections starving and freezing. A severe climatic condition existed year before last during which millions of tons of coal were frozen up on the sidings, and unless strenuous efforts had been made by the railroad authorities, by issuing priority orders and seizing the coal, a serious condition might have ensued. I have seen industries closed or operating on half time, three days a week, in my State; I have seen people suffering from cold. I myself during a portion of one winter ran an automobile in the city of Washington to assist in delivering coal that was contributed by a rich and generous man of this city. I have seen coal men come here asking for a solution of their problems, trying to find some one in the Government who was authorized to pay some attention to their interests. In the lobby of the Senate Chamber a large group of men came to me and said, "We have bought coal from the operators; we have sold it under contract; the Government has that coal in the cars; we can not get paid for it; and we will go bankrupt unless somebody pays some attention to our interests." I went to the Federal reserve bank with those men and arranged for them to get the accommodations necessary to carry them through that crisis.

I have seen the people in my section of the country suffering for want of coal, because of the problems and conditions which have caused coal to mount to $25 a ton, when by some wise management, proper organization, and system, and if there had been some one to direct this great confused mass of industry and activity, that condition could have been avoided. It is my opinion that legislation is necessary to centralize at least the policy of this industry. I seek in no way to interrupt its continuity, its success, and its prosperity; but I do say that such conditions in this country must be rectified, and the people of the country expect us here and now to rectify them. The coal operators, of course, can come here, and a willing ear is lent to their pleas that nothing be done to interfere with their business; but what of the man back home, who is compelled by reason of unnatural economic conditions to pay from two to three times what he ought to pay for his coal? When the condition existed under which $25 a ton was being charged for coal there was ample coal in the country and a sufficient number of miners to mine it, but there was not sufficient transportation at that time. If there had been somebody under this Government who could have told the people that there was plenty of coal, and told them to wait, it would have avoided the buyers' panic which ensued. To allow a condition to exist in this great country, of whose industrial, commercial, and financial activities we are so proud, under which, while we mine and consume annually 500,000,000 tons of coal, we yet live from hand to mouth, without provision being made for a catastrophe such as a strike or bad weather conditions, in my opinion, is a reflection on the intelligence of the statesmanship of the United States.

Therefore, through a sincere desire to pass certain constructive legislation, I have proposed this seasonal freight rate bill and I have proposed the publicity bill, placing in the Department of Commerce, where it belongs, a study of this question; a study of the question of storage; a study of the question of statutory zoning to avoid this crisscrossing and this uneconomic and costly condition that exists in the railroads; a study of the question of a centralized bureau to buy our coal here for the Government service, for which we buy 8,000,000 tons a year; a study of the question of costs and profits, so that the public may know the reason why they are paying this high price for coal. They have a right to know it.

It is with that sincere desire to pass constructive legislation that I have introduced these bills. Let the critics who oppose them produce remedies themselves rather than criticize this constructive effort on the part of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to pass legislation to relieve this condition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McNary	Spencer
Ball	Gooding	Moses	Stanley
Brandegee	Hale	Myers	Sterling
Broussard	Harreld	New	Sutherland
Bursum	Harris	Nicholson	Swanson
Calder	Harrison	Norris	Townsend
Cameron	Johnson	Oddie	Trammell
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Wadsworth
Caraway	Kellogg	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Kendrick	Poindexter	Watson, Ga.
Curtis	King	Pomerene	Watson, Ind.
Elkins	Knox	Ransdell	Williams
Ernst	La Follette	Sheppard	Willis
Fernald	McCumber	Simmons	Wolcott
Fletcher	McKellar	Smith
Frelinghuysen	McKinley	Smoot

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is necessarily absent, attending the funeral of Alabama soldiers at Arlington Cemetery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Did the Senator from North Dakota wish to address himself to this matter?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President. I had given notice that I should speak at this time upon the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill, and I assume that I can go on at this time.

Mr. POMERENE. I was not aware of that fact. I expected to address myself to the bill now pending before the Senate; but under the circumstances, as the Senator has given that notice, I shall not presume to interfere.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION FOR VETERANS OF WORLD WAR.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I gave notice some two days ago that I should speak to-day upon Senate bill 506, the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill.

I think it but fair and just to each one of my associates on the Committee on Finance to say that while the report which I have filed received their unanimous approval, and the bill as amended had no vote against it, the remarks which I shall submit to-day, not having been submitted, of course, to the committee, express my individual reasons for supporting the bill and may possibly in some respects be counter to the views of some members of the committee. They are my views, and I shall assume sole responsibility for them.

Mr. President, the general assumption that the enactment into law of this bill will immediately load billions of dollars upon an already overtaxed public is without any foundation whatever, and I wish in the very beginning to set at rest any such fears. The bill as it is reported will not call for the expenditure of any sum of any consequence before July 1 of 1922. The amounts which will be payable beginning at that time will be scattered over 20 years. I am certain, under the testimony which has been given, that it is a safe estimate that not more than 20 per cent of the war veterans will adopt the cash plan proposed in the bill; and if that should be the case, and 80 per cent should adopt the insurance plan, then the cost in any one year would not exceed $200,000,000. If every soldier entitled to receive benefits under this bill, if enacted into law, should select the cash-payment basis, the cost to the Government would be but $1,560,166,330, and would be payable in $50 quarterly installments to each soldier, thereby running over two years and a half; so that even on the cash-payment basis the draft upon the Treasury would not be heavy.

If, as I have suggested—and the testimony bears me out—about 80 per cent will, in all probability, accept the insurance plan and only about 20 per cent the cash plan, the amount which would be payable in 1922 would be $108,898,000; in 1923, $200,737,000; in 1924, $118,000,000; and the amount would then be decreased down to 1935, when there would be no cost; but, assuming that one-third would borrow the full amount they would be entitled to borrow under their certificates, there would be something coming in to the Government at that time and the principal amount would be payable about the first of the year 1943.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I was attracted by the Senator's statement that perhaps 80 per cent of the men would accept the insurance plan and 20 per cent the cash plan.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I wondered upon what the Senator based that conclusion.

Mr. McCUMBER. The facts upon which I base that estimate will be found in the report itself. Of course, I did not attempt to quote the testimony in the report. I am informed by the head of the American Legion that if this bill becomes a law they will have at least 3,000 men in the field, all advising, so far as possible, that Title III of the bill be accepted; and the fact is that that title gives such advantages over the cash payment plan that any reasonable man would accept it, unless he was extremely hard pressed for ready money and would be willing to sacrifice great benefits in order to have a little cash at a particular time.

Remember, Senators, that under the cash plan no soldier draws all of his money in one installment; he can not receive more than $50 quarterly, and it would be paid running over a period of from two to two and a half years.

I have formulated tables, which I included in the committee report, and I ask that those tables may be inserted in the RECORD at the close of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. These several tables, based upon different assumptions as to the number who will accept the several plans, will give a rather clear idea of what it, in all probability, will cost the Government each year for 20 years if this bill is enacted into law.

Mr. President, I wish now to deal entirely with the merits of the bill.

In asking Congress to enact into law the provisions contained in this soldiers' adjusted compensation bill we are seeking not only to fulfill a present financial obligation but also, so far as we can, to initiate a future policy that will avoid the necessity for such remedial legislation should another war occur.

This great world conflict has demonstrated more clearly than ever before that the onus of war, its burdens and duties, rest with equal and impartial weight upon the shoulders of every unit composing national entity. War is no longer dependent alone upon the strong arm and valiant heart of the warrior. In every future conflict the telling force will be the industrial prowess that supplies and nerves the soldier's arm. War will become more and more the pitting of the industrial greatness of one nation against the industrial greatness of another. Chemistry will combat chemistry, and the arm of valor will fall palsied before the poisoned breath diffused by cunning alchemy.

It is reported that Napoleon once said that the god of war was always on the side of the army with the greater artillery. The Napoleon of to-day will declare that the god of war is always on the side of the nation with the greatest and most independent industrial organization, weaponed with the deepest lore in the art of insidious murder.

In time of war the mobilization of our industries is not one whit less important than the mobilization of our armies. The duty to bring our fighting force up to the highest degree of perfection is not one whit more important than the duty to bring our mobilized industries up to a like degree of perfection. It therefore follows that in time of war the duty of every man employed to make shells, to make as good ones as he knows how to make, and to make as many as he possibly can make in a day, is, before God and country, just as sacred and obligatory as the duty of the soldier to fire those shells and to fire them as accurately as he can. And the man who makes those shells has no more right to say to his country in the throes of a desperate war, "I will not make these shells unless you give me $10 a day," than the soldier would have to say, "I shall not fire those shells unless you pay me the equivalent of $10 per day." And the contractor who, taking advantage of the criminally foolish "cost-plus" plan, and seeking to enrich himself by encouraging slacking and idleness and thereby delaying and enormously adding to the cost of Government war supplies, is just as much a criminal at heart as the general who surrenders his army to the enemy for a financial compensation.

The country's cause, Mr. President, is the cause of every citizen of that country, and not of one group only. In the stress of war every pound of energy, every drop of blood in the veins of the individual, belongs to the threatened State. The civilian selected to make the gun is entitled to no indulgence which is denied to him who is selected to shoulder that gun. In time of war every male citizen capable either of bearing arms or performing service of any character is a soldier of his country, in duty bound to give the very best there is in him, whether selected for civil or military employment, and so far as possible for equal compensation.

Had we followed that simple, sound, and everlastingly just principle during this World War it would not have cost us to exceed one-fifth of what it did cost us. The taxes actually paid in cash would have been sufficient to cover all our expenses and short-time securities only would have had to be issued until the taxes to meet them could have been collected. Had we followed that principle it would not have been necessary to issue long-time bonds requiring a billion dollars a year to meet their interest alone. Had we followed that principle this bill would never have been before the Congress of the United States.

Condensing this acknowledged principle into a single sentence: The patriotic duty as between soldier and civilian being concurrent and equal, the right of the soldier who offers his very life with his service to receive a compensation equal at least to that of the civilian who risks neither life nor limb inevitably follows. And mark you, Mr. President, if there is another great war, that principle will be invoked. We took the first great forward step in acknowledging that principle of duty and equality when we enacted the selective draft bill, imposing military duty upon every male citizen between the ages of 18 and 45 alike, thereby declining to accept the voluntary sacrifice of one citizen and relieving his less patriotic brother from like service. But we worse than flagrantly abandoned that principle of equality when we allowed the stay-at-homes to not only reap enormous financial advantages over the soldier but to reap them at the expense of our Army and its proper equipment and supplies. The soldier suffered because of this abandonment and the bill before us is to partially compensate him for his loss. It is not a bonus bill. It is not a gift or gratuity. It is a compensation in part payment of a debt of the highest moral obligation.

Mr. President, most of our soldiers were compelled to spend months in the several cantonments of this country before they had an opportunity to go to the front. To bring home to you the justice of this proposed adjusted compensation I want to picture to you just what these soldiers looked upon day after day. I can better illustrate it by describing what you and I looked upon every day in the construction of the hundreds of temporary buildings which were being erected upon the Capitol grounds and down on the Mall.

What we there observed we found to be the almost universal rule over the whole country—in every shipyard and wherever Government work was being conducted and at a time when the very life of the cause for which we were battling depended upon our getting ships afloat to meet the U-boat ravages. Any man who could saw a rough board or drive a nail could, and did, qualify as a carpenter and received his $10 per day whether he was 50 per cent efficient or 5 per cent efficient. Of the force employed in the construction of the buildings I have mentioned, not more than one-third were in action at any given moment. I never saw a single shoveler in digging shallow trenches for the foundations move more than three shovels of earth before stopping to take a rest or visit, and generally not more than two. I have seen eight men—as many as could get hold of a 2 by 6 fourteen-foot joist—slowly move one after another from a loaded truck, carrying them some little distance and gently laying them down. Two good men could have unloaded them in half the time.

These carpenters of whom I am speaking received their $10 a day for week days and $20 a day for Sundays and holidays, so they all worked Sundays and most of them laid off on Monday to make the snap last longer.

Testimony shows that work in our shipyards was far below 50 per cent efficient, though the wages were increased 300 per cent and more.

The blood of the patriotic soldier must have boiled with indignation to feel that while his Government estimated his services, including his board and clothing, at about $3 per day, with all the risks and all the hardships, it supinely submitted to—nay, it invited by its form of contract—the immense increase in the wages and profits of civilians which we knew and the soldier knew must be measured by a Government bonded indebtedness which he upon his return from conflict must help to satisfy.

Mr. President, it is impossible to fully and fairly present the soldier's side of this case, the iniquities and inequalities which he endured in comparison with his stay-at-home brother, without also presenting the policy adopted in financing and supplying our war needs and the disastrous results of that policy. Much as we should like to forget those worse than blunders, inasmuch as they are the basis of this proposed legislation—the reason for its enactment—they must have passing notice.

The great majority of the American people have but a hazy idea of the fundamental policies adopted in raising the funds for the production of war supplies.

The war administration started out with the determination to satisfy the demands of both organized capital and organized labor, whatever their demands might be, and leave the public to foot the bill, which it has done and will continue to do in exorbitant taxes and extortionate prices for many, many years to come.

This administrative policy might more aptly be described as playing both ends against the middle, the two ends being capital and labor and the middle being the paying public.

Our war administration not only allowed but absolutely encouraged the most scandalous profiteering on the part of both capital and labor. It permitted excessive profits on the part of capital and then levied heavy taxes against the profiteer, dividing the spoils on a sort of 50-50 basis. But, Mr. President, the public in the end paid both 50's, as all big taxes and all big profits must be paid by the ultimate consumers. After paying these heavy taxes, capital, in supplying the Government war needs, which included nearly every product, came out of the few months of war with a rotundity many times bigger than when we went in. We have 50 millionaires in the country now where we had 1 before the war, and the millionaires in existence before the war are now many times multimillionaires.

But do not imagine for a moment that all the profiteering was on the part of the capitalists. Human nature is the same in every class. If one class operated on a bigger scale the other equaled it by its greater number. While our soldiers were dying in camp with pneumonia for want of proper clothing and shelter, the worst slacking ever allowed in any country was permitted to go on unrebuked. Scarcely had the Government consented to the demands of strikers for one raise in wages than another demand was immediately made, another strike organized, and again and again the Government surrendered. And just to the extent that wages went up efficiency and production went down. The administration virtually said to contractors, "Pay any price that may be demanded for material, and any wage that may be insisted upon. You will not be called upon to advance a single penny. The Government will put up the cash for both, and whatever the cost may be, will pay you a 10 per cent bonus on the entire cost for just standing by smiling and seeing your Government filched of billions. The more you can make it cost the Government the more you get out of it."

That, Mr. President, was the "cost-plus" system adopted by the war administration. Was it any wonder that men were encouraged to become slackers? Was it any wonder that when they knew that these favored contractors were thus gold-lining their pockets, it created in their hearts a craving to take like advantage of their Government's necessities? Was it any wonder that whenever they threatened to strike for higher wages their demands were immediately met? The contractor could not afford to close such a gold mine. He believed in taking while the taking was good.

I am more than conservative when I declare that, making every allowance for excusable errors—and in the hurry of preparation there must necessarily be many—the expense of this war has cost the American people at least five times what it should have cost them. It cost us for one year of our participation in the contest far more than it cost France for four and a half years and with three times the number of men actually engaged in the conflict. And, just remember that we got to the front only about half of our men and their small arms. Our soldiers were, for the most part, transported by British vessels and supplied from French and British war stores. Our average daily expenditure for each man under arms was four times that of England, six times that of France, and ten times that of Italy. There was no earthly excuse for this colossal difference. Of course, if we were dealing only in millions or a few hundred millions, we might not complain. But when we multiply many billions by five and contemplate this mighty load unjustly imposed upon us and on future generations we have a right to carry in our soul a just bitterness against those who permitted such gross wrong. But many of you say that the Government could not help itself. It was compelled to submit to these impositions.

Mr. President, the Government that can take your boy and compel him to stand for days waist deep in mud in the trenches until he dies of exhaustion, or to charge into a crater of hell to a sure death, has power to take your property, paying you a fair value, without being held up. This power, inherent in every nation, was extended and ratified by special legislation. I do not recall a single instance in which this right of eminent domain was exercised except as against the wheat raiser, who seems always to be selected as the goat.

But you may ask, How could the Government have protected itself from these profiteering pirates? I answer:

First. A Government that could not protect itself in time of war as well as in time of peace would be worse than a failure. It could have done so. Its failure to do so was a most grievous offense, not only against this generation, not only against every soldier in the field, but against every child of the future which must bend its back to the yoke of taxation.

War powers, Mr. President, are almost without limit. Acting under this sovereign war power, the draft law, which declared that every male citizen between the ages of 18 and 45 should answer the call to battle, was enacted. The boy or man selected under that call could not answer: "I really do not like that kind of employment and, therefore, decline to soldier. Furthermore, I will not serve for $30 per month and board and clothing, and if I consent to serve at all I shall insist upon an 8-hour day and Saturday half holiday. And if the employment proves disagreeable or hazardous, I reserve the right to quit individually or to call a strike for higher pay or more agreeable conditions of war."

No, Mr. President, under its sacred duty to preserve the honor of the Nation, the Government simply said to this boy or this man: "Come on, this is your wage. Your hours of service may be 24 or as much longer as your power of endurance can stand. The exigencies of war may be such that you may be commanded to meet certain death. You shall obey every command without a murmur, and if you refuse to obey or counsel others to so refuse, your only answer will be the firing squad."

Now, do you mean to suggest to me that the Government which exercises this power of life and death over every boy selected, for sacrifice if need be, could not take from a merchant or manufacturer the cloth to make that boy a uniform without being held up for four times its value? Is it possible that the Government which fixes the wages of the soldier boy, who must stake his very existence in his compact, has no control over the wages of those who remain out of danger and who are called upon to supply the Nation's demand in the prosecution of the war? Is it possible that the Government which can exact service of the soldier to the limit of endurance, aye, to the very limit of his young life, is impotent to exact a full, honest day's service for a full, honest day's pay from the stay-at-homes? Is it possible that it must stand idly by while inefficiency and strikes, hindering the supply of proper shelter, clothing, or medicines, allow thousands to die in cantonments or force the soldier to go into battle half supplied or equipped, as on the battle fields of France, where the enemy's war planes hovered over our forces and reported every movement and the location of our artillery, while we had not a single war plane of our own to meet theirs or a single scouting plane to locate their lines or report their movements?

There is but one common-sense answer: The service duty of the stay-at-home is not one whit less than the soldier duty of those who are called. It was not only the right but the highest moral duty of the Government to require full and complete service to supply its soldiers in the field and also to protect itself and the public from every character of profiteering. Its failure to do so, to my mind, was a crime against all.

What, then, should the war administration have done the moment war was declared?

First. It should have declared that it would not pay one cent above the splendid peace prices which then prevailed over the country for what it might need during the war, and if goods were not freely offered for such prices, then it would deposit the full value to the credit of the owner and take the property. That alone would have held every commodity, and consequently every wage, to the prevailing peace standard.

Second. That it would not allow the public to be charged a price above the Government standard. There is no use, Mr. President, in saying that it could not do this, because it did exercise both these powers over the farmer's wheat and over the miner's copper. It said to every miller and every purchaser of wheat: "You are allowed to pay just so much for your wheat and to sell your flour for just such a price, and if you pay or charge more your license to do business will be revoked." Without such action wheat would have advanced to $5 per bushel. What the administration did with wheat and copper and some other articles could just as well have been done with every other commodity. As it was, while the administration held the farmer's product down to half what would have been its market value, as fixed by the law of supply and demand, it permitted everything which the farmer must buy to advance from two to five times its prewar value.

Third—and this is the important proposition. The Government should not have limited its authority to those only whom it singled out and put into the ranks, but should have maintained the same authority over all. When the Government officials drew from the list of eligibles the name of Mr. A, and said to him, "You are drafted for the ranks to fight for your country for $30 per month," it should also have said to the other eligible, Mr. B, selected to stay at home, "You will be permitted to continue any useful work at your present good wages, but you must give full and fair service so as to properly support the soldier in the field, and if you are needed on railway or in shipyard or munitions plant, you will be summoned there. Your wages shall not be reduced, neither shall your efficiency be reduced."

Had we followed that course, we would not have conjured up this spirit of demoralization or invoked this reign of unrest, but with only a comparatively small increase in indebtedness and consequent taxation, and with our efficiency and productivity increased rather than decreased, we should now be enjoying a natural and healthy prosperity that would be assured for many years.

Early in the war I introduced a bill, Senate bill 3586, to draft into the military service of the United States all male citizens over 18 and under 62 years of age as a reserve army, making all who were not selected under the draft law for military service subject to call for any service required by the Government, and at Government wages. It should have been enacted into law. As our selective draft law was a great step in advance of the old volunteer system and was based upon the theory that every man owes the same duty to his Government, so in our next great war we shall insist that the duty to supply the soldier in the field is just as unassailable as the duty to bear arms. And the Government will exercise the same control, for the sake of efficiency and economy, over the civilian, whose duty it is to produce for the Army, as over the soldier, who must depend upon such production.

Mr. President, we always want to satisfy our obligations for equity's sake alone. Our conscience is never quieted while there remains against us an unsatisfied debt, whether it be legal or moral. We should hold our country to the same standard of rectitude.

We know that standard was not maintained, but, on the contrary, Mr. President, when the soldier returned from the front he found that his home-staying brother had been receiving from two to four times the monthly stipend which he had received. He further found that this extraordinary home wage, coupled with wastefulness, extravagance, and profiteering, had enormously added to our bonded debt, which is, even at the present time, including short-time certificates, about $24,000,000,000. He found vast increases in the savings accounts and many other evidences of gain in which he had no share. He had none of these opportunities for large gains and increased savings which always come with sudden currency inflation and high wages. He found his old position held by another. The two years of absence at his time of life necessarily, to a certain extent, unfitted him for an immediate entry into his old occupation.

The principal thing, however, which he found awaiting him was an enormous bonded indebtedness of his country which he must shoulder with others, although he had no share in the high wages and big profits which had piled that indebtedness mountain high. Without any of the benefits which always flow from vast inflation of currency, he returned to share all of the hardships that necessarily occur during a period of deflation and business depression.

Therefore, Mr. President, leaving out of the computation every vestige of sentiment, every element of gratitude, and applying only the rigid rule of mathematical equation, we can not deny that by allowing the man who fought for his country, who placed his life in pawn for his country, the increase in his compensation provided for in this bill, we are still giving him for his services with all the consequent risk and hardship a compensation much below that which the common laborer in the United States received during his absence. It seems to us that justice, no less than gratitude, demands this adjustment. Great as it seems to be when crystallized into dollars and cents, we are compelled to admit that it is much less than is actually due the soldier selected for military duty as compared with that which was received by his countryman who performed civil duties only.

But there is another and, to me, a very weighty reason why I especially urge upon Congress the fulfillment of this moral obligation to our soldiers of the World War.

Mr. President, if there is any one thing in this world which engenders discontent it is the sense of an injustice, and the pathway of discontent, flowered by envy and hate, generally leads into the ignis fatuus of the seemingly ever-green fields of paternalism, only to end, however, in the stagnant realm of socialism, the cemetery of ambition, the sepulcher of every hope and aspiration, the graveyard of individual initiative and self-reliance, where humanity itself, with all its intellectual glory and achievements, disintegrates and decays.

Mr. President, what the country needs to-day and what it will need during the formative period of a new social and industrial era is a patriotic and courageous conservatism. Were I asked what class of our citizenship would give us the greater proportion of men who would measure up to this requirement, I should unhesitatingly declare the American soldier. The veterans of the Civil War have been the very backbone of safe and sane conservatism during the last half century. The young soldier of to-day, imbued with the same patriotic sentiments, will carry the banner of progress along the same highway of individual and national greatness. I know of no higher or safer standard of American citizenship, its consecration and its duties, than that contained in the preamble of the constitution of the American Legion:

> For God and country, we associate ourselves together for the following purposes:
> To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States of America; to maintain law and order; to foster and perpetuate a 100 per cent Americanism; to preserve the memories and incidents of our association in the Great War; to inculcate a sense of individual obligation to the community, State, and Nation; to combat the autocracy of both the classes and the masses; to make right the master of might; to promote peace and good will on earth; to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy; to consecrate and sanctify our comradeship by our devotion to mutual helpfulness.

Senators, to-day you and I, to the best of our ability, guide the destinies of our country. To-morrow our places will be filled by the veterans of the great World War. I could wish for no sturdier or safer successors. But, Mr. President, I want them to come into the halls of legislation with the feeling that they have been treated with exact justice by their country. I want no soldier to feel that this is not a just Nation, and that he must look for greater equity in a further extension of governmental activity into fields heretofore held open for the exercise of individual energy and capacity—those fields in which alone is developed the highest type of manhood and womanhood. Mr. President, I want him to continue to inculcate the principle of greater individual obligation to the State and less dependency of the individual upon the State. I want him to still inculcate the true doctrine of government, that the State is his creature and not his creator, and that it is possessed only of the intelligence and character with which he endows it; that when the individual asks the State, his own creature, to relieve him from his own initiative and responsibility, his unused faculties must rapidly become abortive and the whole State and society must soon sink to the level of his own incapacity.

In my report, Mr. President, I have explained very fully the several features of the bill, and by a system of tables have indicated the cost to the Government under different assumptions as to the number who might make application for each of the several benefits proposed in the bill.

The purpose of the bill is to allow as adjusted compensation to the veteran $1 per day for each day's service in the United States, and $1.25 per day for each day's service overseas. Inasmuch as at the close of the war the soldiers were given extra pay of $60 each, there are deducted 60 days from the total service of each veteran.

Title II, the cash plan, called "adjusted service pay," provides a cash payment for these days of service. If the payment is $500 or over, it is to be made in 10 quarterly installments. If less than $500, it is to be paid in quarterly installments of $50 each.

Title III, adjusted service certificates, gives the veteran the option to take insurance payable at the end of 20 years. If he chooses this insurance plan, he will receive as the basis of his adjusted certificate a sum 40 per cent greater than the cash plan, and this sum will bear interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually. In the event of his death prior to 20 years, his estate will receive the amount of such adjusted certificate and interest compounded annually for 20 years.

Title IV, vocational training aid, entitles the veteran to receive vocational training at the expense of the Government to an amount equal to his adjusted service pay plus 40 per cent.

Title V, farm or home aid, allows the veteran to receive from the Government the adjusted service pay plus an additional 40 per cent, to be applied toward the purchase price of such home or farm.

Title VI, the land settlement aid, gives the veteran preference right to take lands on the opening of public or Indian lands to entry, or the restoration to entry of public lands, and on all reclamation projects now in existence or hereafter established.

The veteran at his option may select any one of these plans.

Of course no one can say definitely just what proportion of the soldiers will apply under the cash payment plan. The greater the number that applies under that plan, the less the cost to the Government. My own judgment, which is also supported by the testimony, is that probably 80 per cent will accept the insurance plan, or its equivalent, and that not to exceed 20 per cent will apply for the cash.

Before the veteran makes his application he will have been fully informed not only by the department itself but through the several soldier organizations just what each plan means to him. And when he understands that under what is known as the cash plan he will not receive the whole sum at one time, but that it will be scattered over from 2 to 2½ years in installments, and further understands that if he accepts the adjusted certificate plan, he will not only receive a paid-up insurance for 20 years, but that at the end of 2 years he can borrow 90 per cent of his adjusted pay, plus 4½ per cent interest, and at the end of 5 years can borrow 80 per cent of his adjusted certificate, plus 4½ per cent interest, the vast majority will apply under the adjusted certificate plan. Assuming that 80 per cent will apply under that plan and 20 per cent under the cash plan, and also assuming that about one-third will borrow against their certificates, there will probably not be any year in which it will be necessary to raise more than $200,000,000 to meet the obligations of this legislation until the year 1943.

Mr. President, I do not think it will be necessary to raise another penny by taxation. Steps have already been taken to fund the obligations of our allies to the United States in long-time bonds. If we should eliminate all that is owing us except that which would come from Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium, the amount of the indebtedness of those four countries alone, with interest up to date, would be more than ten billions of dollars. The interest upon that ten billions of dollars will almost doubly take care of the amount which would be due under the certificate plan, on the assumption that 80 per cent would accept that plan, and will more than take care of any amount that would be due under the cash plan, even though every soldier entitled to receive payment under that plan should accept the cash-payment basis.

Mr. President, if I could speak to every veteran of the World War, I would urge him most earnestly to make his application under Title III, the adjusted certificate plan. He will receive at least 40 per cent more under it than under the cash plan. He will have a paid-up insurance for 20 years without one penny of additional cost, and can borrow against his certificate, if he needs the money to secure a home or for any other purpose, more than the whole sum he would receive under the cash-payment plan, and can borrow it at a very low rate of interest. Nevertheless, Mr. President, I would still urge upon him never to borrow against it but to hold it as an insurance only for the 20 years.

Mr. President, even though our action calls for an outlay from which we would gladly escape, and will enforce greater economy along other lines, let us not delay the fulfillment of this, to my mind, sacred financial obligation; and let a future Congress see to it that in any future war there shall be no distinction made or allowed between the patriotic duty of the soldier and that of the civilian, and that industrial slacking and profiteering shall be visited with as heavy a penalty as draft evasion or desertion. We will then conduct war upon a just and proper basis, and there will be no further call for remedial legislation of this character.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment before he takes his seat?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that a good many representatives of the American Legion have appeared before the Senate committee and I know before the House committee that had this matter under consideration, and that those committees have received a number of letters written by soldiers on the subject of this bill. Can the Senator give the Senate any idea, from those letters and from the expressions of the soldiers through their representatives who have appeared before the committee, what per cent of them will avail themselves of this adjusted compensation feature and take insurance or a cash bonus?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say that I think less than 10 per cent of the veterans of the war, especially those who have not kept in close touch with the legislation, understand just what the cash plan is or what the insurance plan is. I judge that from letters, and so forth. There seems to be a general assumption that under the cash plan the soldier can receive the entire amount at one time immediately after he has made his application. He seems not to have been informed of the fact that under either the House bill or the Senate bill or the bill that passed the House in the previous Congress the cash-plan payment would be scattered over two years and a half, as I have said, and that the most he could receive would be $50 quarterly, and that at the end of two years, almost as soon as he could have received the full amount, if under $400, he could borrow on an adjusted certificate an amount that would be as much as he would receive under the cash plan at one time, and still maintain his insurance, his interest of 4½ per cent being equalized against the 4½ per cent which the Government allows him upon his adjusted certificate.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not hear all of the Senator's remarks. Under the House plan, when would the payments begin to operate?

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the old bill they were to begin to operate on January 1, 1921. Under the bill which is now introduced and is reported, the cash payment will begin to operate upon July 1, 1922.

Some Senators thought that was rather a long time; but we must remember two things: First, that it will require some time before we can get the records required under the bill and get into operation in our departments the necessary steps to give the soldier the information, and give him time to apply. It would require thousands of extra clerks, if we want to make it, for instance, in six months. This will give us, we will say, an allowance of about six months for the departments to get ready to give all the information; will give six months for the American Legion and other associations to get ready and inform the soldiers themselves of their rights and what is for their best interests; and then will give the soldier himself six months to determine which plan he will take advantage of.

But in the case of building a home, buying a farm, or taking advantage of the title in reference to vocational education, he may begin immediately after his application is filed to receive payments thereunder.

Mr. HARRISON. What I wanted to get definitely in my own mind was that under the bill which passed the House last year, and which was before the Senate, the cash-bonus feature applied immediately, did it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. The succeeding January.

Mr. HARRISON. It would have made it apply from January 1, 1921?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. But this bill makes it apply from July 1, 1922?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Which is some 13 months off. Where does the Senator get his six months' proposition?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have stated I consider that after the bill passes it will take about six months for the departments to get ready to send out and receive the applications, unless you provide them with several thousand additional clerks, and it would take them very close to six months, even though they had those clerks, before they could get the data and get the statements made and the blanks and everything ready to send out to the soldiers. Then we want to give the soldier some time to determine which one of the plans he will select.

Mr. BORAH. The soldier has had two years and a half already.

Mr. McCUMBER. The soldier has had no bill of any kind, either two years and a half or two months and a half or two days and a half.

Mr. HARRISON. He thought he had one. The Senator thinks it would take six months for the departments here to organize and get started, but if we should pass the bill this month, during the six months he would have the soldier could determine, even though some may think he has not had time to determine, what plan he would choose. So could we not make it the 1st of January, 1922, and still have ample time in which the soldier could be informed and the forces could be organized?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think so, Mr. President, considering the time we would probably get this bill through, which, of course, would not be before July 1. We have also taken into consideration the matter of sums becoming due which must be met during the next fiscal year.

Mr. HARRISON. But I understand it would take very little during the first year.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say to the Senator that those who represent the legion, and others, have indicated their satisfaction with the bill as it stands. The Senator from Mississippi and other Senators have indicated to me that in their belief a vast number would take the cash-payment plan. I hope they will not. I think it will be greatly to their interest to take the certificate plan.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want them to take that which will be for their best interest. The American Legion itself desires to organize and present the matter thoroughly to the soldier for the very purpose of getting him to select anything but the cash plan, any one of the others, believing that it will be for his best interest. They intend to put men in the field for that purpose.

As to whether the Government can possibly meet this before July 1, 1922, is more or less conjectural. Undoubtedly, if the Government sets out to do it, and makes it by that time, it could raise the money to do it; but I believe, considering the state of the Treasury, and the enormous sums we will have to pay, and the time it will probably take before we will get any interest upon the debts due from foreign Governments to ourselves, it would be better to let those who desire to take the cash plan have their payments begin in 1922, because we must remember that those who are seeking the insurance plan make their applications, and if they are made 15 days before January, their rights would take effect the 1st day of the next January; if beyond that, the 1st day of the next July.

Mr. HARRISON. Does that apply to the cash bonus, too, to make it apply the 1st day of January, 1922?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the cash plan, as I have stated, under the bill begins on July 1, 1922.

Mr. HARRISON. Has the Senator suggested in the course of his remarks the difference between this bill and the bill which passed the House?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have stated it in the report which I made and the reasons for the changes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator set forth in his report all the different plans?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; in the report the Senator will find the different plans and an estimate made on the assumption, first, that every soldier would take the cash plan. We then make an estimate, with the assistance of the actuary of the Treasury Department, Mr. McCoy, to determine just how much will become due each year until it is paid up. Of course, that will be about two years and a half. Then you would pay the whole sum, and the whole sum would be about a billion and a half, to be paid in two years and a half, and that would be the end of it. But, of course, I believe the majority will accept the certificate and insurance plans.

Then we have made out a table on the assumption that 80 per cent will take the insurance plan and 20 per cent the cash, then upon the assumption that 66⅔ per cent will take the insurance plan and 33⅓ per cent the cash, and then on the assumption that one-half will take each. We have given just what it will cost the Government each year under each of these supposed selections, and each Senator can use his own judgment as to about what it will cost the Government each year; but I think it would be helpful if Senators would read the testimony that was taken in arriving at their judgment.

Mr. OVERMAN. The insurance plan must be very attractive if the Senator thinks 80 per cent of the soldiers will take that instead of the cash. If it would not impose on the Senator, I would like to have him tell me why he thinks the insurance plan would be taken by 80 per cent instead of the cash plan.

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated why in the report, but I will reiterate it.

Mr. OVERMAN. If it is in the report, I do not ask the Senator to restate it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me state to the Senator that when this bill becomes effective the average soldier will be over 28 years of age, an age when most of them either have homes of their own or have homes in contemplation. I believe they will exercise the average judgment of the young man of that age who is married or about to be married and is looking forward to the future.

To determine about how many would accept like provisions under the insurance plan we went over the tables of the insurance companies and found that men of about that age who take insurance in 20-year endowment policies that about 20 per cent of them borrow against those policies. But I have assumed that we have perhaps more colored people in the Army than we have of the proportionate number who would take insurance generally, and have increased that to 33⅓ per cent of borrowers, and we have made our tables on that basis.

Now, suppose a person should be entitled to $400 on a cash basis. He can not get that $400 all at once. He gets $50 quarterly for 2 years. That is what he will look at—that a $50 bill is all he is going to get quarterly, and that he is not going to get $400 all at once.

Now, he looks at the next plan. He says, "If I take the certificate plan, I can get 40 per cent more—that is, $160 more—making $560, as against the $400. At the end of 2 years I can draw 90 per cent of the $400 plus 4½ per cent compounded annually for the 2 years." If he allows it to go to 5 years, he can borrow 80 per cent of the adjusted certificate, which will be $560, plus 4½ per cent compounded annually for those 2 years.

That will appeal so much more strongly to the man of ordinary judgment who is looking to his future interest that I am inclined to believe that the greater number will take it. In addition to that, I know from my talks with officers of the principal soldier organization, that when this bill becomes a law they intend to send their men out among the posts and explain it to the soldier and urge him to take the certificate plan and not the cash plan.

Taking all these matters into consideration, it is my belief that when the applications actually come in most of them will be for the certificate plan. If they should apply to-day, without knowing what the bill is, I will admit that probably 90 per cent would take the cash plan.

Total number of Army and Navy entitled to benefits July 1, 1922	4,565,718

The cost table shows as follows:

1. On basis that every veteran should accept the cash plan:

Total cost	$1,560,166,330
To be appropriated for in—
1922	456,571,800
1923	475,124,000
1924	276,937,900

2. On the basis that every veteran should accept the certificate plan, with no borrowings, and making allowance for annual payments on account of deaths:

Total amounts in 1942 would aggregate	$5,273,345,563
To be appropriated for in 1922	21,980,656
This sum increases yearly up to 1942, when the amount required would be	56,962,190
Leaving all the balance to be paid in a single payment due in 1943, of	4,290,280,031

But, as suggested, these two tables do not indicate what, in fact, will be the operation of the law, but are given to show possible minimum and maximum costs and place a limit upon extreme calculations.

3. On the basis that 20 per cent of the veterans should accept the cash-payment plan and 80 per cent the certificate plan, and assuming that one-third of those entitled borrow on their certificates the full amount they are entitled to borrow, and making allowance for repayments, and also for deaths, the total amount in 1942 would aggregate $4,356,338,615.

The yearly payments, however, would be:

1922	$108,898,900
1923	200,737,944
1924	118,453,954
1925	79,386,725
1926	69,628,416

After 1927 the annual payments would decrease on account of repayment of borrowings until 1936, when the repayments on account of loans would be more than sufficient to meet the payments on account of deaths and loans. This would continue until 1940, when the excess of payments on account of deaths would amount to $2,543,321. These payments would increase until in 1942 they would amount to $19,325,219. The final payments on account of maturity in 1942 would amount to $3,383,692,496.

4. On the basis that one-third of the veterans would accept the cash-payment plan and two-thirds the certificate plan, making the same allowance as in previous tables, the entire cost up to and including 1943 would be $3,888,282,142.

The yearly payments would be as follows:

1922	$160,471,900
1923	336,304,120
1924	113,073,061

From 1924 the amounts will decrease until 1935, when there would be no cost until 1939, four years, during which period the repayments would exceed the amounts necessary to meet the obligation. There would be a balance due at the maturity of the certificates in 1942 of $2,819,743,747.

5. On the basis that 50 per cent of the veterans take the cash-payment plan and 50 per cent the certificate plan, making the same allowance as in the previous tables, the entire cost up to and including 1942 would be $3,303,153,231.

The yearly payments would be as follows:

1922	$239,276,000
1923	478,611,255
1924	133,472,721

These yearly amounts then decrease each year to 1936. Then there would be an excess of repayments of loans over payments on account of loans and deaths for the four years, 1936, 1937, 1938, and 1939, of over $20,000,000. A final payment upon the matured certificates would be due in 1943 of $2,114,807,810.

RELIEF OF DISABLED EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I am directed by that committee, to which was referred Senate resolution 93, submitted by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That S. Res. 59, agreed to June 9, 1921, be, and hereby is, amended to authorize the special committee thereby created for the investigation of various bureaus and agencies of the Government in matters relating to the veterans of the World War, to employ such clerical and other assistants as may be deemed necessary in furtherance of the purposes of said resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WARREN. I do not see present now the Senator who is referred to in the resolution.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; I will ask the Senator from New York, who presents the resolution, to what extent this is supposed to go in the matter of the employment of experts?

Mr. CALDER. I do not believe the committee will need to employ, and only for a limited period, more than two clerks and more than one investigator. The committee is now functioning. I am a member of the committee myself, and we find it very difficult to prepare matters to present to the committee without some clerical help. I do not think the entire cost will be more than $1,500.

Mr. OVERMAN. May I inquire what committee is referred to?

Mr. CALDER. This is the committee appointed as a result of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to inquire into the treatment of ex-soldiers in the War Risk Bureau and by the Public Health Service.

Mr. WARREN. I know full well how ungracious it is to inquire into any expenditures by the United States Senate, and especially for any special committee, but the way we have been traveling along this route and the number of these various examinations and the tremendous figures to which some of them amount require me to say at least that I trust there may come some economy and some end to extraordinary expenditures, and I hope that this one surely may serve as a precedent in economy of investigating committees. Some of our examinations have gone on for years instead of months. In former times when we had such examinations it was very extraordinary to ask for any extra help. The regular committees are furnished with supposedly plenty of clerks. Senators who are not chairman of committees are supplied with just as many clerks as are the chairmen of the committees, barring three or four of the hardest working committees.

It seems to me that a little effort on the part of some of these committees might have excluded a great proportion of the expense we have been under for the last three or four years. However, I am not going to object to the resolution, but I do hope the members of the committee will bear in mind the suggestion I have made.

Mr. CALDER. I shall inform the members of the committee of the Senator's statement. I am a member of the committee myself, and I do not believe the expense can possibly run over $2,500, and I do not see why it should exceed even $1,000.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to address myself briefly to the bill S. 1806, known as the seasonal rate bill. I desire to compliment the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on his energy and enthusiasm and the industry he has displayed in considering the subject. I share his view completely when he speaks of the deplorable conditions of the coal trade during the last two or three years.

I took occasion in the early period of the war to criticize very drastically some of the coal operators in the country, and I have no apology to make for what I then said. Later on, when I found that a few officers of the miners' organizations and a few delegates brought on a strike in violation of their contracts, with utter disregard for the condition of the country, I did not hesitate to criticize them. I differentiate between the mine officials and the delegates, and the miners themselves. The miners were in no respect responsible for that strike, and I measure my words when I make that statement.

If there was likely to be a recurrence of any of this trouble, I should like to know the remedy. If a remedy were presented, I would be for it. If the pending bill would accomplish one tithe of what the Senator from New Jersey thinks it would accomplish, I think I would be for it; but my judgment is that it will do more harm than good, if it does any good at all.

I recognize the fact that there was a time when we had a car shortage, and that car shortage was one of the causes of serious trouble throughout the country, but there is no car shortage now. That car shortage was superinduced by war conditions, and whatever may have been the scarcity of cars—and there was a scarcity, not only in the coal trade but in the transportation service of the country as a whole—we do not have that car shortage now. There is a car surplusage of probably 365,000 cars. I mean by that there are probably 365,000 empty cars. A large part of these are coal cars, but that surplusage is due to present industrial conditions.

The Senator from New Jersey refers to the car shortage as being one of the causes of the trouble, and it was a cause at that time; but coal operators can now get all the coal cars that they want. The price of coal at the mouth of the mine has gone down. I think the rates are somewhat higher than they ought to be. I would like to see them changed. I think they will be changed later, as all of these traffic rates, or the most of them, will be changed, and they will be changed when we approach normal conditions; but there must be a readjustment all along the line.

The Senator has referred to some of the sentiments that prevail throughout the country in support of the bill, and has taken the pains, perhaps in part for my benefit, to read several telegrams from Ohio operators. I assume that there is some difference of opinion out there, but I think the opinion of a vast majority of them is against the bill. I have before me a large number of telegrams bearing upon the subject, some referring to one of the bills, some to the other, and some to both of them. I wish to read a telegram from the Toledo Wholesale Coal Trade Association:

> Report that coal men favor Frelinghuysen coal stabilization measures 1806 and 1807 not correct. We are all bitterly opposed to these bills or any bill that carries with it Federal control of private business. These bills must be considered as socialistic, un-American, and not in the public interest. We hope you can see your way clear to oppose these bills.
> TOLEDO WHOLESALE COAL TRADE ASSOCIATION.

I have another similar telegram signed by the Kenmont Coal Co., another signed by the Elmer Miller Coal Co., another by the Manufacturers' Coal Co., and another by the manager of the Big Four Coal Co., all of Toledo. I have another telegram indicating how some of the large consumers of coal feel upon the subject. This is from Youngstown:

> We are large purchasers of coal, having bought last year about 2,000,000 tons. We strongly oppose Frelinghuysen bill to regulate coal industry. It is contrary to President's preelection statement of less Government in business and more business in Government. Its passage would discourage all lines of industry. Business requires relief from interference, not further repression. Would regard passage of this bill as a bad precedent.

This is signed by J. A. Campbell, president of the Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co., which is one of the large independent mills at Youngstown.

I submit these as indicating in a general way the sentiment throughout the State of Ohio. I shall not take the time to read the many other telegrams which I have. I would be glad to have any Senator see them if he desires so to do. I also have a large number of letters bearing upon the same subject.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Ohio in the midst of his remarks, but the telegrams refer to regulation of the coal business. Does the Senator feel that Senate bill 1807 in any way has any regulatory features or any powers of that character conferred?

Mr. POMERENE. It is true that one of the telegrams uses the term "regulation," and I suspect it was not written from the standpoint of the lawyer, but rather from the standpoint of the business man, and perhaps he has not used that expression with entire accuracy. I agree with the Senator from New Jersey that in the ordinary acceptation of the term neither bill could be regarded as regulatory in character. They are supervisory, perhaps, if there is a distinction between the two terms.

But, Mr. President, as bearing further upon the question of car shortage let me remind Senators that in the transportation act the Congress took care of this question, realizing the importance of the coal industry to our entire industrial life, and in section 402, paragraph 12, we provided:

> It shall also be the duty of every carrier by railroad to make just and reasonable distribution of cars for the transportation of coal from the coal mines served by it, whether located upon its line or lines or customarily dependent upon it for car supply. During any period when the supply of cars available for such service does not equal the requirements of such mine, it shall be the duty of the line to apply and maintain just and reasonable ratings to such mines and to count each and every car furnished to or used by any such mine for transportation of coal against the mine.

Then follows the provision for penalties. There are other provisions in the bill which relate to the coal trade particularly, and the power that is given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant priority orders, and so forth. I shall not take the time to refer to the law further.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the condition that exists in that section of the country west of the Allegheny Mountains.

The Senator from New Jersey referred to the fact that there had been a decrease in the freight rates from the coal fields to the Lake Erie ports, and he is right about that; but that is not a seasonal rate. It was a rate that was given to that particular portion of the coal which goes to the far Northwest. Now, what would be the effect of a seasonal rate? The coal which goes to the Northwest is mined in southeastern Ohio, western Pennsylvania, western West Virginia, and eastern Kentucky. The mines that furnish this coal are operated during the summer months. Those are the months when the so-called lower seasonal freight rates are supposed to obtain. Does anyone for a moment believe that a rate of 15 cents a ton, or of even 20 or 30 cents a ton, lower in the summer time than it may be in the wintertime is going to be of benefit to the ultimate consumer on the cold plains of North and South Dakota or Minnesota or Wisconsin? It may be a benefit, perhaps, to the coal dealer, the man who above every other man profited exorbitantly during the last two or three years, but the coal consumer on the cold plains of the Northwest is not going to get that benefit.

What is going to be the situation? Bear in mind also that a large part at least of the coal cars that take coal up to the Lake ports during the summer months are immediately loaded with iron ore to be taken back to the furnaces. When we speak of "coal cars," remember that the term is a misnomer if it is thought that "coal cars" are limited in use to coal distribution. Coal cars are used for the handling of rough freight, for the hauling of ore, as I have indicated. The States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan have adopted large road-improvement programs; they are spending literally millions of dollars in paving the country highways; and the cars used to haul road materials are the cars that are also used to haul coal. Ordinarily if coal cars were to be limited to the carrying of coal for our local consumers, then we could understand it would be a matter of railroad economy to use those coal cars for hauling road material during the summer and coal during the winter; but assume, for the sake of the argument, that there is a reduction in the coal rate from the mines in southeastern Ohio and in that vicinity to the Lake ports. Are the coal consumers going to get any benefit out of it? I have demonstrated, I think, that the coal consumers in the far Northwest will get no benefit from it. Then what is the effect?

Senators may talk as they choose about getting the laboring man and the average consumer to lay in their supply of winter coal during the summer months. I am not complaining of them; we are all, perhaps, more or less improvident when it comes to our own individual matters, and we delay procuring our supply of coal until the last minute.

If the pending bill were to encourage the production of coal during the summer, it would have this effect: It would prevent the use of the coal cars for hauling road materials. Then what would be the situation? If we have a low freight rate in the summer season, it presupposes a higher freight rate in the winter. Then we should have the anomalous condition that in Ohio, in western Pennsylvania, in western West Virginia, and in eastern Kentucky, the very heart of the bituminous coal territory, the people in those States would have to pay a higher freight rate for their own coal from their own mines, and all for the benefit of the coal dealer who buys the coal for the Northwest, presumably for the consumer. I dare say that there can be no difference of opinion between us when I repeat my declaration that if there were a differential of from 15 to 50 cents per ton during the summer time in the freight rates it would not make 1 cent a ton difference in favor of the consumer in the far Northwest.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator suffer an interruption, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is it not true that the carriers made a differential this summer of 28 cents in order to stimulate the movement of coal to the Northwest?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there is a difference between that and the seasonal rate. I have been trying to get a reduction of freight rates for our road material. My friends from the South have been trying to get a reduction of freight rates for their citrus fruits and for the vegetables that are produced in the South. The Senator presents no argument in favor of seasonal rates.

Let me suggest to Senators while I am discussing this subject that we are not without a pretty good authority upon this question. Mr. Kruttschnitt, of the South Pacific Railroad Co., was before our committee as representing in part the railroad executives. There may be a difference of opinion as to the correctness of many statements which he may have made, but he discussed the question of seasonal rates as applied to coal in his section of the country. I am going to take the privilege of reading a paragraph or two from his statement.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. I was under the impression that the pending bill authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to make seasonal reductions in the charges for the transportation of coal, but I find, upon a more careful analysis of the bill, that it simply authorizes them so to distribute the rates so as to add to the winter rate whatever they take from the summer rate.

Mr. POMERENE. That is the substance of it. There was an original draft of the bill which provided that there should be a sort of a base freight rate, and then provided that the rates could be reduced during the summer months a certain number of cents per pound below the base rate and could be raised during the winter; but whether it is one form of bill or the other, the same economic principle obtains in both.

I now read with reference to this subject from page 92 of the testimony of Mr. Kruttschnitt on Senate resolution 23.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Permit me to tell you a story of a personal experience right on that point. When the Southern and the Union Pacific roads were merged as a unit I had charge of the operation of both roads, and I was also president of the Union Pacific coal properties, and we had that same trouble, that everybody wanted coal in the winter, when every car and locomotive was busy, and they couldn't get it, and there was a dreadful complaint, and I said to the manager of the coal company: "We are going to try the experiment of making a seasonal reduction in the price of coal, and you make it material, so as to encourage people to fill up their cellars, encourage dealers to fill up their yards with coal, whilst we have got ample locomotive power and cars." We tried that for two years, and the first year it had substantially no effect. The second year, I think, we managed to get 25,000 tons more than normally bought in the season, and it was then given up as a bad job.

Senator POMERENE. What was the total for the season?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. The total for the season at that time, when we were in the commercial coal business, would have been three or three and a half million tons. So, you see, the movement was insignificant. We couldn't get people to do it. We not only offered the inducement in lowering the price but we sent agents around to dealers to explain this thing to them and to coax them to take advantage of the lower price to stock up.

Senator WOLCOTT. At the same time was there a seasonal concession in price at the mines?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. What?

Senator WOLCOTT. I say, at the same time, was there a seasonal concession in price at the mines?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. This was a concession in price at the mines.

Senator WOLCOTT. Yes; in the rate; but at the same time were the mine operators making a seasonal concession in price like they do here in the East?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. You mean the miners?

Senator WOLCOTT. The mine operators.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Well, we were the mine operators; these were mines belonging to the railroads.

Senator POMERENE. What decrease in the seasonal rates did you make?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. About 10 per cent.

Senator POMERENE. Ten per cent of the total?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No; 10 per cent of the normal sale price. In other words, if the price was $2.50 per ton, why, we made it $2.25 per ton.

Senator POMERENE. Well, did you make a decrease in the transportation rate?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No; but it was immaterial how the decrease was made. The net effect was to make the coal cost the dealer and consumer 25 cents a ton less.

Of course, as they owned both the mines and the railroads, it made no difference whether the reduction was on the price of the coal itself or on the transportation rates. Suffice it to say that the total decrease was 25 cents a ton, which would, I dare say, be more than the average decrease which could be obtained under the pending bill. I do not think there can be any question about that.

I have here a letter received this morning from Mr. L. G. Macomber, who is traffic commissioner of the Toledo Chamber of Commerce. He incloses a brief which was prepared by the chamber at the time a similar bill was pending at the last session of the Congress. I am not going to take the time to read all of his letter, but he points out specifically, it seems to me, the evils incident to this proposed legislation, or, to put it in another way, he points out the fact that it will be positively injurious to the coal trade and the coal consumers in the State of Ohio. He speaks for them in a general way, and, perhaps, for the Toledo people in a special way. It will be remembered that a good deal of coal is shipped to Toledo and sent up the Lakes. He says:

As this is a matter that is of great interest to all Toledo coal consumers, particularly the industrial consumers, we have given the subject considerable study and have reached the conclusion that this bill would work a hardship upon Toledo users of coal for the following reasons, which I submit for your consideration—

Let me repeat that he is referring to the seasonal coal bill of the last Congress, which differed somewhat in phraseology but not in principle from the bill which we have now pending before us—

1. Toledo is peculiarly situated with respect to ability to obtain coal during the summer period for storage for use during the winter period, in that she is one of the important Lake Erie ports which serve as a transfer point for coal from the Ohio mines for shipment via the Lakes to Lake Superior ports.

We interviewed an operator of several Ohio mines who stated that during the last five years there has not been a surplus of empty cars at the mines at any time. That the mine output has been controlled entirely by the car supply, and the mines operated to the capacity of the cars obtained—

Let me stop to observe that there is no want of car supply now—

That at no time during the past five years has there been a sufficient number of cars to take care of either the mine output or the orders on hand.

As the Lake Superior docks are entirely clear of coal, the present indications are that the northwestern requirements for Lake movement this year will be in the neighborhood of 30,000,000 tons of coal. As the greatest movement of coal via the Lakes in any one year was between 26,000,000 and 27,000,000 tons of coal, this should indicate that the carrying capacity and the empty car supply of the carriers will be taxed to the limit to take care of the Lake requirements; and the fact that during the past five years there has not at any time been a surplus of empty cars should also indicate that there is very little prospect of empty equipment to take care of local requirements for even current consumption, making it impossible for the local coal consumer to take advantage of a reduced coal rate during the period of navigation, and resulting in his being penalized with the 15 per cent increase in coal rates because of his inability to obtain coal during the period of the reduced rate.

2. Owing to the Northwest being dependent upon the mines of Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Kentucky, the carriers are morally obligated to serve that territory in the matter of transportation of coal during the period of navigation to the limit of their ability, for two reasons:

First, because of the saving in the cost of the coal to the consumer as result of the reduced rate in effect via rail and Lake, which is $1.27 from the Hocking Valley-Jackson group mines to Toledo docks, plus 50 cents per ton Lake haul, or a through rate of $1.57, as against an all-rail rate of $4.60.

If you should reduce the rail rate, of course there would be a temptation to use these cars to supply at least a part of this northwestern territory during this time; and the longer they are en route from the mine to the consignee and return, the less service they can be in hauling coal or anything else for Ohio or other people living in the coal-producing States.

Second, because to force the movement of coal from Ohio mines to the Northwest in the winter would put a coal car into service an unreasonable length of time, depriving local consumers of its service; or would mean about 1,000 miles of rail haul as compared with 185 miles from the mines to the Toledo docks.

3. With very few exceptions, Toledo industries as a general thing have not storage space for the storage of over 30 days' supply of coal. To provide such space at the present time—if it could be secured—would be so expensive as to offset any saving resulting from a reduced coal rate for five months of the year; therefore, owing to the inability of the average Toledo industry to store coal, they would be penalized by the provisions of the Frelinghuysen bill.

I do not see how there can be any question about that. I confess this report states in the next paragraph a condition which I did not think prevailed as to Ohio coal. I thought Ohio coal could be stored without fear of spontaneous combustion; but this report says it can not.

I read:

4. Ohio coal, which is the most extensively used bituminous coal in this vicinity, will not store satisfactorily, experience having developed that after this coal has been on the ground for a period of 60 to 90 days spontaneous combustion occurs, and there is no means of quenching the fire, once it has gotten started in a pile of coal, except by cutting it out from the balance of the pile.

Let me suggest to Senators who do me the honor to listen to me that it has been demonstrated that most of the Indiana coal, Illinois coal, and Iowa coal will not store, for the very reason that it will be destroyed by spontaneous combustion. It is well enough to talk about storing this coal. Some say it can be done by having a sort of concrete basin, filling it with coal, and then submerging it all in water. That, of course, adds to the cost.

Under these circumstances, what is going to be the effect in the Central West if this bill does go through? In the first place, in my judgment, there would not be a consumer who would get the benefit of a single dollar by reason of the reduction in the freight rates, unless it be the coal dealer himself. In the second place, if it did have the effect of increasing the transportation to the very extent that we have been short of cars in the past, so we will be short of cars in the transportation of building material, of stone and rock and cement that are used in the construction of highways, and it is going to interfere with that line of industry, when this coal could just as well be hauled after the road-building season has ended.

I want to be very respectful about this matter, but for the life of me I can not see how any benefit is going to come from the passage of this bill.

I have here a large number of letters. I am not going to take the time to read them. One is from a Mr. C. E. Maurer, who has been a coal operator for long years. He is out of the business now. He points out, along the same line as this brief from the Toledo Chamber of Commerce, that any attempt at seasonal rates now would be a calamity, since the mines for the most part are busy during the summer supplying the Lake region. Whatever its effect may be in other sections of the country—and I am not prepared to discuss that except as I can infer what the conditions would be from what I know are the conditions in the great productive centers of the Middle West—this bill, if it becomes a law, would injure the country immediately west of the Alleghenies.

If anyone can bring to me a plan which will stop or prevent the iniquitous practices which prevailed a year or two ago, I shall be glad to take it up and I shall be glad to give it my support; but in my judgment this is not going to help us.

My good friend from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] refers to this as constructive legislation. Constructive legislation ought to provide a remedy for the evil, and as yet no one has proved to my satisfaction how this would prevent the evils from which we have suffered in the past.

For the reasons that I have thus briefly stated, I shall oppose this bill. At the same time, I want to be perfectly frank about it. When the suggestion of seasonal rates was first called to my attention, it was a thought that appealed to me very much; but as I became more familiar with the conditions in the coal trade and along industrial lines and found out what the effect would be, it seemed to me that the weightier reasons were against the bill rather than for it.

I have here a letter from Mr. J. G. Barbour, who was the coal commissioner of Stark County, Ohio, and for years was the traffic manager of the Metropolitan Paving Brick Co. I believe he is now the president of that company. In this letter he gives his estimate of the pending legislation from the standpoint of a manufacturer who has had large experience in dealing with traffic rates, and particularly with coal-traffic rates. I ask that this letter may be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

THE METROPOLITAN PAVING BRICK CO.,
Canton, Ohio, May 16, 1921.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I received to-day proof of my testimony before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, which was forwarded to me for correction.

Due to the short time I had and numerous interruptions, I did not cover the coal side as fully as I would have liked, but only touched on the car-shortage angle, which I might summarize as follows:

If the movement of coal was encouraged during the late summer and early fall, it would only increase a peak movement which exists in normal years, due to heavy seasonal movement of construction material using open cars plus a heavy withdrawal of box cars for grain movement, increasing a seasonal car shortage which ordinarily exists at that time.

I am taking the liberty to add to what I desired to say to the committee the following:

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

Will it help the coal operator or coal miner?

With the present stagnation in the coal market, there is a depression in price of 50 cents to $1 per ton. The proposed reduction of 25 cents to 50 cents per ton in freight rates, if it brings about such increase in demand to materially relieve the operator or miner, will also bring about an increase in price, which will nullify the freight reduction and will not be any financial inducement to the consumer to store coal.

What consumers have the physical facilities to store coal?

DOMESTIC CONSUMER.

Hotels, office buildings, large apartments, and commercial buildings: Owing to high renting value of space in these buildings, there is no space allotted to coal storage, and it would take more than the proposed freight reduction to be any financial inducement to store coal.

Householders, who use from 5 to 15 tons per year, the inducement is not sufficient to overcome the other uses they have for their money during the summer, and the average home is not provided with sufficient room allotted for coal storage for the year.

The above domestic consumers, then, are dependent upon the retail distributor, who now has the inducement of very low current prices, but if he should attempt to sell this cheap coal in the winter at the higher winter price he stands a good chance of being investigated for profiteering.

INDUSTRIAL PLANTS.

Industrial plants running part time will only store coal proportionate to such part-time operation.

Idle industrial plants will not store coal when they have no assurance that they will not be idle all winter.

Industrial plants in full operation will only store coal in excess of usual protective storage for profit on the excess storage itself, and if such profit were probable, face the uncertainty of curtailed operations from the business depression.

In other words, an industrial coal shortage is almost entirely dependent upon a material revival of business and a marked increase in manufacturing, and as freight rates are not a serious factor in railway fuel, their shortage is also controlled by the increase in manufacturing.

PUBLIC UTILITIES.

Public utilities—lighting plants, street railways, waterworks, etc.—can with reasonable certainty anticipate their needs and in their plans arrange for storage in a manner to avoid the need of railroad facilities, provide storage at the plant or within trucking distance, assuming that reduced rates will be overcome by increased prices and the depressed prices certain. They have every facility to fully protect themselves now and there is no need for others to store to help the utilities.

LAKE CARGO COAL.

With present low prices and the many boats tied up, there is every inducement to move Lake coal early, and if the steel business is curtailed more boats will be tied up, and should there be a shortage of boats on account of less ore movement, then boat rates may be raised to cover empty return voyage. Lower rates do not seem to be needed here.

New England coal, moving by rail and water, has every inducement now of low current prices and low boat rates, due to idle coasting vessels.

CONCLUSION.

Lower rates can add nothing to present financial inducements to store coal. A coal shortage can only come from a material increase in manufacturing or general business revival.

I am inclosing clipping of American Railroads, an official publication, voicing the policies of the railway executors, "By buying coal at prevailing high prices on only a hand-to-mouth basis." How would a reduction in rates induce them to store coal?

Hoping the above expression of my views may direct your attention to the many elements that must be overcome in any legislation attempting to overcome the present depression in the coal industry.

Very truly, yours, J. G. BARBOUR.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, what I shall say, and say briefly, has no relation whatever to the subject under discussion, but relates altogether to other matters.

Reports have gone out from Washington that there will be neither tariff nor revenue legislation enacted at this session of Congress, and these reports have had more or less of a surprising effect throughout the country. While I do not assume to speak for the Republican majority, nevertheless, as a member of the Finance Committee, having some knowledge of the situation with reference to these subjects, and having at the same time kept in more or less active touch with the members of the Ways and Means Committee, I can say with something of knowledge of the subject that both tariff and revenue legislation will be enacted at this session of Congress.

Nobody is to blame for the existing conditions. Everybody knew that after the war there would come a period of intense reaction. We are now in the midst of such a period. We are all aware of the fact that factories are closed; that 400,000 cars are idle, as has been stated on the floor this afternoon; that 6,000,000 men are out of employment; that mines are shut down; and that there is a state of business collapse throughout the country. This is not the fault of legislation, and legislation can only measurably cure it, and then only after a lapse of time.

Congress can not wave a magic wand and alter conditions that are the outgrowth of such an appalling calamity as the great war that engulfed the world; but, after all, by means of legislation we can measurably cure these evils. My own thought was that we should have passed revenue legislation before we began the consideration of a tariff bill, and I still believe so; and when there was a joint meeting of the Republican members of the Finance Committee and of the Ways and Means Committee for the purpose of considering those questions, and the priority with which they should be handled, I took the position, as did my friend, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], that we should first pass revenue legislation, and afterwards give due attention to the consideration of a tariff bill.

I believed then and I believe now that we can not revive business in the country until we repeal certain provisions of the tax laws. I do not believe that capital in the United States will be invested until we repeal the excess-profits taxes and the high surtaxes on incomes, because capital will not come out of hiding and will not get into the channels of trade and the arteries of commerce to bring back health to the industries of the United States until those taxes shall have been repealed.

In the first place, the excess-profits taxes were largely passed to the consumer when they were paid and added to the final cost of the products. In the next place, when they were not paid—and they are not paid now because there are no excess-profits taxes—they still had as repressive an influence on business and industry as when actually paid.

When first laid we collected two and a half billions of taxes of that character. The estimate for next year is that but $450,000,000 will be collected, and if business conditions shall continue throughout the country as they now are doubtless they will vanish to the zero point. Yet, while they are not being paid, they still have the same effect upon business and upon industry as if they were actually being paid.

The man who could be relied on to furnish capital for improvements, betterments, additions, and developments is now using his surplus for the purpose partially of paying taxes, and the remainder of that surplus is going into tax-exempt securities. If I had my way about it, we would first enact tax legislation, to assure the business interests of this country just what their tax burdens will be, in order that confidence may be restored and in order that capital may be invested. If capital is not invested, labor will not be employed, and if labor is not employed the factories and mines will remain idle, and these box cars will continue to stand on the sidetracks unused, as my friend from Ohio remarked; and with idleness of the unemployed comes all the attendant train of woes which usually accompanies such a condition throughout the country.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am disposed to agree with the Senator that revenue legislation should advance at once; but I just wondered why the Senator looked so fiercely over toward us Democrats when he was making that statement.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am not looking with fierceness toward the Democracy, but with sympathy. My friends mistook the feeling that was behind my look.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. The profound sympathy of the Senator from Indiana for this side of the Chamber at this time might be accounted for by that old couplet:

A fellow feeling in our bosom
Makes us wondrous kind,
He has troubles of his own.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, there is no trouble here, and will not be, when the people fully understand the situation. I do not want anyone to think that we have been remiss in the discharge of our duties, for such is not the case.

Immediately on this Congress convening the Ways and Means Committee began the consideration of a tariff bill, and for months, with unceasing diligence, they have labored in the formulation of such a measure. It will be reported to the House within the next 10 days or 2 weeks at the latest; the House will give it probably 3 weeks of consideration, and then send it over to the Senate. We all understand that the Senate can not originate revenue legislation; but in order to save time, there was an agreement between the members of the Finance Committee and the members of the Ways and Means Committee by which the members of the Finance Committee should hear the revenue bill discussed, not for the purpose of formulating legislation but for the purpose of having hearings, so that when the House came to consider revenue legislation they could take our hearings and supplement them only where it might be deemed desirable.

We had those hearings, gave six weeks to that subject, and everybody was heard who wanted to be heard. Those hearings have been turned over to the Ways and Means Committee, and as soon as the tariff bill is out of the way, they will immediately take up the proposition of the formulation of tax legislation. They will have our hearings on which to base the formulation of their measure, and thus save that much time.

When they have passed their tariff bill and sent it over to us, we on the Finance Committee will take their hearings on the tariff legislation as the basis of our action and thus save just as much time as we possibly can save when we consider the magnitude and the importance of the questions involved.

What I should like to see done, Senators, is simply this—after that tariff bill comes over to us, the Finance Committee will probably be four or five weeks in considering it and reframing it before we can introduce it into the Senate, and during that time the House of Representatives will have passed the revenue legislation, and when that comes over to the Senate, personally I should like to see the Finance Committee take that measure up and report it into the Senate, and see the Senate pass revenue legislation before we even begin the discussion of the tariff legislation in the Senate of the United States, because I am profoundly convinced that we need tax legislation in order to revive business in the United States far more than we need tariff legislation.

You may formulate your tariff legislation as best you can, but because of changing conditions throughout the world, because of the difference in the rate of exchange, the best tariff bill we can pass to-day will in many of its provisions be obsolete in six months from now. But the tax burden will be known to the business man, and the business man will know precisely what is expected of him in the days that are to come, and it will give a measure of reassurance far more than any other legislation we can enact in this Congress.

Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I trust that that will be the procedure of the two Houses with reference to these vital questions. But the country may be assured, Mr. President and Senators, that legislation of this kind will be enacted, that we will pass a tariff bill, that we will pass revenue legislation, and that we will do all that this Congress can do to revive the business of the country and rehabilitate the stricken industry of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I agree absolutely with the Senator. In my judgment, we ought to have taken up the tax question first, but I suppose that under the arrangement which was finally agreed upon that is impossible now, unless it can be carried out as the Senator has just suggested.

I was rather interested this morning to see in the paper a suggestion from high authority that we would not deal with anything except tariff and taxation during this session; that we would recess three days at a time, and so on, until the committees got that legislation in shape. I would like to have the idea of the Senator with reference to that. There are many other questions of very great importance before Congress, and it seems to me that since we are here it is a good time to take care of them while the committees are getting ready the tax and the tariff questions. Some of these problems are rather pressing, and they ought to be disposed of. The fact that this is an extra session should not preclude us, in my judgment, from doing what we ought to do and getting it done as quickly as possible. I would like to have some assurance from the Senator that that will be the course while the session is on.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, while I am but a meek and humble follower here and can speak for nobody but myself, so far as I am personally concerned, I was never in favor of running away from any proposition. I know of no reason why we should not meet the problems which confront us and find a proper solution for them as they are presented to us from time to time. Nobody has suggested to me that there should be an adjournment from time to time; I have not heard of it.

I noticed in the paper this morning such a statement was made; but even with the great respect I have for newspapers, I occasionally question something I see in them, though, of course, I may be guilty of treason or lese majeste when I make that statement.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the remarks of the Senator, but I should like to inquire whether there is anything on the program which seeks to rehabilitate our foreign commerce? Only a short time ago our foreign commerce amounted to about $13,000,000,000 a year. It has now dwindled to the vanishing point, and I would like to know whether or not the Senator and those associated with him in outlining the program for Congress has had under consideration anything for the purpose of reviving the foreign commerce of the country, and whether or not that is not an important element in the revival of business inside of the country?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, certain steps were and are essential in order to revive foreign commerce. First is the settlement of the German reparations. With that we could not have anything to do under our policy. That has been settled; and until it was settled, as a matter of course, the conditions abroad were bound to remain topsy-turvy, because all industry was in turmoil and agitation. There was nothing settled. We could do no business with them, and they could do but little business with us, until the determination of that question. That was the first step in the rehabilitation of the industrial situation in Europe, and that has been taken.

In my judgment, the second essential step is a declaration of peace with Germany. That will soon be an accomplished fact, because I am informed that when Senator LODGE returns next Monday that question will be taken up and finally disposed of, and, in my judgment, that is a vital step in our relationship in an industrial and commercial way with European countries.

As a matter of fact, we must look, too, to the welfare of the merchant marine, and that has already been entered upon. The President has appointed a new Shipping Board, and I think one which appeals to the confidence of the country, and one which will work out the gigantic problems with which it has to deal. The merchant marine is one of the great questions that is before us, because we are not justified in paying foreign nations $400,000,000 every year to carry our commerce overseas to other people waiting to receive it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the people of this country are growing impatient, and that they are not satisfied with a mere prospect of a declaration of peace with Germany. It seems to me that they realize that a mere declaration of peace does not rehabilitate anything; that after the declaration of peace, if commerce is resumed, there must be a peace treaty, and that there must be some affirmative, active steps taken before we can influence in the slightest degree the business interests of this country. It seems to me that if the program of the present administration is to stop where the Senator has left it, the people of this country will be sorely disappointed.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, my friend from New Mexico is harking back to the League of Nations, and still has that in his mind as the one essential thing to restore peace on earth, good will toward men, and prosperity to all mankind. I do not agree with him, and I think that just as soon as we shall have passed the peace resolution with Germany we can then with perfect safety enter upon trade relations with her, and will do so in the old way, and that it will not be necessary to wait until the formulation and ratification of a final treaty before we shall, to the very full, resume commercial relations with that country, and with all of Europe. I have no doubt about that. But, of course, they must first get into a condition where they can buy from us and we can sell to them.

Mr. HARRISON. In that connection there are a great many people in the United States who do not agree with the Senator from Indiana on the proposition of a League of Nations or some other kind of peace except a separate peace.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Not very many.

Mr. HARRISON. In that connection I hope the Senator will not object if I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a very interesting letter that was written of date June 15, just a few days ago, by a very distinguished proleague Republican, or independent, I might say, to President Harding, and with the letter I should like to incorporate, following it, the names of 31 distinguished Republicans, including Charles Evans Hughes, Herbert Hoover, and Elihu Root, who signed a petition from the American people to the present President that that is the best way to get peace.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I should object to the incorporation of any such letter in my remarks.

Mr. HARRISON. Then following the Senator's remarks?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is all right, but I do not care to father the letter.

Mr. HARRISON. That will satisfy us entirely.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I shall interpose no objection to the printing of the letter in the RECORD, but I do not want it incorporated as a part of my remarks, because it is wholly foreign to anything I have in mind and I disagree with it entirely. I do not believe there is any such animal as a proleague Republican. The Senator might as well talk about a white blackbird.

Mr. HARRISON. One of them was Elihu Root, another was Charles Evans Hughes, and there were others. This was before the election, of course.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, before the election!

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know how they stand now.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is an old, old document, antiquated and exploded and almost forgotten, is in the rubbish heap and is no longer to be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the letter will be printed in the RECORD at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do.

Mr. KING. I have a great deal of confidence in the broad views of the Senator from Indiana respecting the steps to be taken in order to bring prosperity to the United States and to the world. I was greatly interested in the suggestion of the Senator that we must establish trade relations with Germany. I most heartily agree with the Senator in that declaration and I infer from what the Senator said that our prosperity is linked largely to the prosperity of other nations and depends upon having extended trade relations.

I am interested to know, in view of the statements which are constantly made as to the tariff policy of the Republican Party, how we are going to trade with Germany and how we are going to trade with other nations if we are to have embargoes and high tariff duties exceeding in their vastness and immensity the Payne-Aldrich tariff schedules——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of blessed memory!

Mr. KING. Will the Senator please tell us how we are going to trade with Germany or have Germany trade with us if we are to exclude from our own land the exports of other countries?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not intend to enter this field this afternoon, inviting as it is. It is the old, old cry of our free-trade friends that we can not sell to other countries unless we buy from other countries. That has been disproved all along the line of our country's history. If I had the facts here I could astonish my friend from Utah, if he is not familiar with them. They show just what we did all the time we had those high protective tariff laws. The other nations do not buy from us because they love us. They buy from us because there is no place else to go and get the goods. They will continue to do so in the future, just as they have in the past, and we shall have no trouble building up our industries under a protective tariff that will protect the American laboring man in the factory, in the mine, on the farm, and wheresoever he may be employed, against injurious competition from abroad.

The Senator understands the argument. I am not going into that field at this time. Everybody is entirely familiar with it, and I believe that if the American people are satisfied on any proposition, it is that there must be a protective tariff in order to restore prosperity in the United States. Does or does not the Senator believe that?

Mr. KING. I do not believe that the protective tariff per se ever did or ever will establish prosperity. I agree that we should have a tariff for the purpose of raising revenue, and I believe that in imposing that tariff it should be so laid and so levied as not to discriminate against any section or against any class, and that if we impose a tariff upon the finished products there is no reason why there should not be a reasonable tariff upon the raw materials. We must have some revenue from tariff duties. The Democratic theory, as announced in the great tariff act of 1846, is one that the Republicans must come to if there shall be genuine prosperity in this land.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Since the Walker tariff was enacted in 1846 we have had but two or three spasms like unto that, and every time it has been invariably accompanied by commercial disaster and industrial depression, and we have never gotten away from those periods of depression until we could have a protective tariff.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me—I appreciate his graciousness—I invite his attention to a statement made by Mr James G. Blaine in his admirable and entertaining book, in which he discussed the Walker tariff schedules and the benefits that were derived thereunder. He said it was the best tariff this country had ever produced.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I dislike very much to challenge the recollection of my friend from Utah, but he must have dreamed that, for Mr. Blaine, when he went on to explain why we had something of a measure of prosperity under the Walker tariff, explained it by saying, first, that we discovered gold in California, which brought out large sums of money and put it into channels of trade theretofore unknown; secondly, because there was a great famine in Ireland that led to excessive exports abroad that we had never enjoyed before; and, thirdly, because of the Crimean War, which was then being fought, which induced tremendous exports from this country abroad, and that just as soon as those fictitious conditions had passed away and we got the full effect of the Walker Tariff Act of 1846 we went into a condition of depression theretofore unequaled in the history of the United States except under a similar tariff of 1837. That is what Mr. Blaine said, and he was right.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course, we all realize how exceedingly prosperous the farmers of the country have been since the emergency tariff bill was passed. I wish to observe in this connection that just a day or two ago I had a letter from a very prominent newspaper man of Ottawa, Canada, in which he said that since the passage of the emergency tariff bill American goods in Ottawa were being boycotted and British goods were being purchased now.

But that is not what I rose to say. The Senator took occasion to criticize the House, and if I may be permitted——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Criticize the House? Oh, no; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, he criticized the program in favor of tariff legislation rather than revenue legislation.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator agree with me?

Mr. POMERENE. I agree with the Senator, if I can do so under the parliamentary rules regulating this body.

However, there is another subject that interests me very much. A few weeks ago the Senate, on a roll call and by a unanimous vote, approved the so-called Borah amendment requesting the President to arrange for a conference with Japan and Great Britain looking to a limitation of armament, and, of course, thereby conserving the revenues of the country. A day or two ago Lloyd-George was reported to have said that he would welcome overtures from the American Government looking to some program for disarmament.

Now, under those circumstances does the Senator think it would be right to mutilate the Borah amendment? Ought it not to be passed, and when it is passed ought not the President immediately to appoint his commissioners looking to a reduction of armament, so that we can save to our people the large amount of money which we shall be compelled to raise by increased taxation in the event the armament program goes on? I would be interested in having the views of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Well, I do not disagree with my friend from Ohio. I voted for the Borah resolution because I believed in it. I have no doubt that if it be enacted into law, which I trust it may be, the President will immediately proceed to act in accordance with its provisions. In fact, with all due deference to my distinguished friend from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I think the President would have so proceeded anyhow, and I know that with the resolution of Congress behind him stimulating him, if, indeed, he needed stimulation through legislative action of this kind, he will doubtless proceed in that way.

Mark you, I do not assume to speak for the President. I have no authority whatever to voice his sentiments on the floor of the Senate, but I well know what his views are with reference to disarmament, and I well know what he intends to do. I feel quite sure that he was in no way displeased with the introduction or the passage of the Borah resolution, and that he will conduct himself cheerfully in accordance with its provisions and its terms.

Mr. President, I have been led far afield from the original purpose of my talk when I rose, which was simply to say that I think we should pass tax legislation before we pass tariff legislation. I am not talking about the past and not criticizing anyone. I must disabuse the mind of my friend from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] of the thought that I am criticizing anybody. I am not. I am stating purely a condition. In the midst of the extreme situation that confronted us, no one was to blame for having taken that step at that time; but in my judgment the wise thing to do to revive business will be to permit the business world to know what the tax burden is going to be in the future, and after that we can discuss the tariff and subsequent questions that may confront and perplex us.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further to me?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am not sure whether I correctly understood the Senator a moment ago. Of course, I yield to his historical knowledge; but as I understood his position when I alluded to Mr. Blaine, it was that the Walker Tariff Act was born contemporaneously with the Crimean War and that its success was attributable to the Crimean War. Of course, the Senator will recall that the Crimean War was 10 years after the Walker Tariff Act, and that it had such an inconsequential effect upon our domestic and foreign commerce that we can not attribute the benefits of that act to the Crimean War, which occurred 10 years after the Walker Tariff Act was enacted.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I certainly made no such statement as the Senator has attributed to me. I stated the three reasons that Mr. Blaine gave why there was a measure of prosperity under the Walker Tariff Act of 1846—first, the discovery of gold; second, the famine in Ireland; third, the Crimean War. The Crimean War occurred in 1854, the Walker tariff law was enacted in 1846, and those three things in succession caused the degree of prosperity we then had; and after they passed away then we got down to the real thing, just as we always do under a Democratic free-trade law, and that was the depression that always results, and we escaped from it only by the enactment of a protective tariff, and that is one of the measures we must adopt to enable us to escape from the deplorable conditions existing in the United States to-day.

[Letter with annex No. 1 presented by Mr. HARRISON during Mr. WATSON'S speech and ordered to be printed in the RECORD at the close of his remarks.]

"HAMILTON HOLT'S LETTER TO PRESIDENT HARDING, DATED JUNE 15, 1921.

"It is now six years that the League of Nations issue has been before the country. It is now two years that you, as Senator, presidential candidate, President elect, and President, have had the League of Nations issue officially before you for action.

"As Senator you voted to have the United States enter the existing league provided the Lodge amendments were made part of that act of ratification.

"As presidential candidate you left the country, and even your own followers, in doubt as to your attitude. Thirty-one preeminent Republicans, (1) among whom were your Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, and your Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, assured their fellow countrymen that you would go into the existing league. Senators BORAH and JOHNSON and the other 'irreconcilables' assured them you would not.

"As President elect you did not see fit to disclose your attitude on the league beyond what you had said during the campaign. Both the 'thirty-one' and the 'irreconcilables' claimed you for their own.

"As President, however, you have unequivocally repudiated the existing League of Nations (2) whose area comprises considerably more than half the earth and whose population numbers three-quarters of the human race. (3) You even permitted without rebuke your ambassador at the Court of St. James (4) to say that you will have nothing to do with any 'commission or committee appointed by the league or responsible to it directly or indirectly, openly or furtively.'

"You have, nevertheless, as presidential candidate, repeatedly promised during the campaign, and as President you have reiterated that promise, that you will seek to establish 'an association of nations based upon the application of justice and right, binding us in conference and cooperaton for the prevention of war and pointing the way to a higher civilization and international fraternity in which all the world might share.'

"You have not yet given the American people the slightest inkling of the terms of this Harding association that you propose shall supplant the Wilson league. Has not the time come, I respectfully ask, for you to do this?

"Surely you can not expect the 48 members (5) of the present league to scrap it and come into your association unless two things are perfectly clear:

"First. That the new association is substantially as good as, or better than, the existing league; and

"Second. That this time a proposal of a President of the United States will have the permanent and overwhelming support of the American people.

"You are a statesman of sufficient experience to know that our people will not support your association—no matter how excellent—without the fullest preliminary discussion. Events of the last two years have demonstrated this. You can not, therefore, hope to get public opinion behind your association without taking your countrymen into your confidence.

"Even if your own party were completely united on the issue, you would still have to get some Democratic support to assure the ratification of your association by two-thirds of the Senate. As your party was the one that first made the league a party issue, the Democratic Senators would be only human now if they turned the tables and also made your association a party issue. They control more than a third of the votes in the Senate and they can block you as you and your colleagues blocked Mr. Wilson.

"If you expect to gain Democratic support it is incumbent upon you to propose an association so concrete and effective as to commend itself to the enlightened sense of both parties. Therefore, the quicker you take the American people into your confidence the better.

"There is another and even more important reason why you should disclose the details of your plan at once. The world is on the brink of revolution, famine, and pestilence. The only two great ideas that have come out of this war as world panaceas are the League of Nations and bolshevism. If you repudiate the existing league and delay too long suggesting anything in its place, you run the very real risk of making the world believe you have no plan at all, and if that comes to be generally believed, can you guarantee that the world would not turn to bolshevism?

"Mr. President, the time has come for you to redeem your promises. The country and the world have waited long enough to know just what kind of an association of nations you have in mind. If you delay much further people everywhere will inevitably conclude that either you have no concrete plan at all or else that you propose to put party harmony above world welfare. In that event there will be nothing left for those who want America to play her rightful part in stabilizing the world but to organize the country so as to capture Congress for the league in 1922 and the presidency in 1924. This can be done, for the vast majority of the American people—Republicans as well as Democrats—want the United States to enter some sort of a league or association with enough 'teeth in it' definitely to hasten the day when, as Victor Hugo prophesied, 'the only battle field will be the market opening to commerce and the mind opening to new ideas.'"

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not rise to enter into debate with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] as to his program, nor to express any dissent from his views so far as concerns his preference for tax legislation to tariff legislation. I only suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the readjustment of the question of taxes will not be sufficient to insure the return of prosperity. Something may be done to ameliorate the situation and doubtless a readjustment of some of the taxes will be found to be wise and beneficial. The details of all those things I am not now going to discuss, but there is this which is disturbing the minds of business men all over the country, and that is the amount of the taxes which we have to raise regardless of where the particular levy rests.

Mr. President, in 1920 the expenditures of the Government, I now find, were a little over $8,000,000,000. That was some two years after the close of the war. Looking at the program as it is, either definitely presented or nebulously proposed, I can see no reduction in the taxes for the next year. It does not make any difference what nice readjustments we may make as to the place of levy, if we do not find some method and some means by which to lower the expenditures of the Government we are not only going to have the depression which we now have, but, in my judgment, we are soon going to reach a point beyond which the people will carry the load no longer. In other words, as stated by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], sitting in front of me, who is an authority upon the subject, we will reach a point where they can not carry it; and I see no program for reducing expenditures, though I think that that is absolutely essential to a successful program of the party in power. Without reduction of taxes there is no hope of prosperity, no hope of business revival.

That brings me, Mr. President, to the consideration for just a moment only of a bill which was reported in the last two or three days, and to which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] addressed his attention to-day, which is known as the "bonus bill," but which is euphoniously called the "World War adjusted compensation bill." I do not desire to criticize the committee which has had this measure under consideration for so long, and any remarks which I make must be understood as being purely impersonal, but, in my humble opinion, if the Republican Party wants to do a really courageous and patriotic thing it will send this bill back in to the committee and make a bill out of it instead of, what I regard it, a pretense. They will recommit this bill to the committee and either present a bona fide compensation bill for the soldiers or they will say that we are not in a condition in this country now to do that. The latter proposition, in my judgment, is the patriotic thing.

The report on the bonus bill undertakes to disclose, first, that we can pay the soldiers $4,500,000,000, and, secondly, that it will not cost the taxpayers anything to do it. It seeks to sustain this theory in this way: First, it postpones the payment to a time far in the future; and, secondly, it then promises the taxpayer that when we do come to pay, the foreigners will pay our soldiers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In other words, from one cause or another, when that time comes the taxpayer will be dead?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. President, this bill specifically provides that no part of this payment shall begin until the 1st day of July, 1922. If that be the intention, why is this Congress passing such legislation? Simply because we dare not impose upon our present constituency, in the existing condition of the country, an obligation of $4,500,000,000 and tell them that we have done so, and still we want to hold out to the soldiers we are making good.

Although the Senator from North Dakota says that this is an honorable financial obligation, we are not willing to say that we will start paying it; but we are simply pledging posterity to fulfill our contract to pay the soldiers. We make the promise, but we do not fulfill—we do not even start to fulfill, but put fulfillment off to another day, and in the meantime assuring the taxpayer that when that day comes he will not have to pay it, or if he does, he will then be prosperous and never miss it. It is not a very creditable performance.

I object to it, Mr. President, first, for the reason that it does not perform the obligation which exists—if it does exist—and secondly, because I am utterly opposed to a cash proposition of any character. It is based upon a wrong principle, upon a wrong theory; and, in my judgment, we make a mistake when we think that the American soldier will be content with our attempt to satisfy him with $50 on the 1st day of July, 1922, and $50 every four months thereafter until he gets $400 or $500, and then call that compensation for his willingness to sacrifice in the Great War. You place his standard of patriotism, as well as his standard of honor, entirely too low.

Let me refer to the report, Mr. President, for the bonus bill is going out to the country to-day, and it is thoroughly misunderstood, in my judgment, from reports which are prevalent. Every soldier who has written to me about it understands that as soon as the bill passes he is to get from $500 to $600 to put in his pocket. I am glad to say that some have condemned the whole theory of cash payment. The report states:

> The bill as reported requires no payments under the principal provisions, Titles II and III, the cash plan and the insurance plan, until after July 1, 1922.

On July 1, 1922, this Congress will, in a sense, be passing out of existence; its Members will be again going to their constituencies for a renewal of authority; and we are making a promise which must be ratified or condemned in that election of 1922. We postpone the pinching of the taxpayer, so as to keep him quiet in 1922, and we say to the soldier, "Your payments will soon begin." Thus we hope to get by. The report continues:

> As in all probability only a very small per cent will apply under the other features of the bill, the vocational training, farm and home aid, and land-settlement plans, the sum necessary to meet those claims prior to July, 1922, will be unimportant.

Two years and more have passed since the soldiers came home, since the World War closed, but now we are proposing to pass a bill, which we say is based upon a solemn financial obligation, and to postpone the payment a year longer, making nearly three and a half years after their services in the contest actually ceased. These men will have settled back into life; they will have readjusted themselves; they will have done the best they could; the crisis will be over; and then we propose to pay them $50 for the first time and $50 every four months thereafter. Is this really helping the men; is this meeting a situation, or is it playing politics with the people's money? If we owe and can pay them, let us pay them. If we owe them but can not pay them, let those who must do the paying do the legislating. As I said, I do not believe in a cash bonus—it is degrading to the soldiers—but if I did believe in it I would provide for payment, and in a way which would help them. To my mind, this plan is utterly unjust both to the soldier and to the taxpayer, and it is discreditable to the Senate of the United States. Again the report says:

> It will be seen that no payment of importance will be required until after July, 1922, giving ample opportunity to adjust the estimated Treasury deficits.

At the rate at which we are going will we be any better off a year from now than we are now? It is true, Mr. President, that in all probability it will give us time to estimate the "Treasury deficits," but it will not give us time to take care of the "Treasury deficits," for, according to the proposed program before us, the Treasury will be in no better condition on the 1st day of July, 1922, than it is now.

> And, by reasonable economy, to meet the added liability incurred by this legislation without any increase in taxation.

Mr. President, that is simply a postponement by the impecunious debtor to another time, when we hope, like Micawber, that something will turn up.

> Without attempting the allotment of any prospective receipts, but merely as a suggestion of one means of meeting the obligations of this measure, the committee beg to remind the Senate that there will undoubtedly be funded into long-time bonds the debts due this country for money advanced our associates in the World War.

How will the funding of the foreign debt into long-time bonds add anything to the Treasury of the United States, particularly if the scheme which is proposed in certain quarters is adopted whereby the interest upon the foreign debt shall be postponed for 10 years? What possible comfort will the American taxpayers get out of any scheme which is now proposed with reference to the method of paying the foreign debt? We know that by reason of the conditions which prevail in France and Belgium and England they are not proposing to pay any portion of their debt within the next 10 years. They are far more embarrassed financially than we are. We may fund the foreign debt, but unless we get the interest which is now due and collect the interest from this date on, and unless we get some payment on the principal, there will be no relief from that source. Does anyone think we will?

> The Allies having now agreed with Germany upon the amount of reparations to be paid by Germany to them will be in a position to use the funds received in reparations to meet the interest on their obligations to the United States. The interest on these bonds will, in our opinion, more than care for the payments necessary each year to meet the requirements of this proposed legislation.

Now, candidly is there a member of the Finance Committee who really believes that we will get any interest on those bonds at all between now and the 1st of July, 1922? Are we willing to go so far in trifling with facts and figures; are we willing to hazard our integrity of purpose by holding out to the taxpayer that by 1922 or 1924 he will get relief from the foreign loan? Look at these countries and then blush with shame when you tell the American taxpayer that relief from that source is in sight. Though financially pressed, though we see no relief, we can at least preserve our reputation as a party by being sincere and honest. We know, if we are correctly informed, that the powers that be in the financial world and who dictate the financial policy of this country, regardless apparently of what party is in power, have already suggested that the payment of interest be postponed for 10 years, presumably, I suppose, so that these foreign powers can pay the interest upon their private loans.

The total advances made by this Government during the war to our associates aggregated $9,580,823,677, of which there has been repaid $114,540,505.

Then an estimate is made with reference to certain specific Governments.

So, Mr. President, the taxpayer is informed that there will be no additional burden, although we are obligating the Government to pay from $1,500,000,000 to $4,500,000,000, and the only substance of the promise which is made to the taxpayers consists of the fact that we propose to obtain the necessary amount from the impecunious and practically insolvent nations abroad. I say again that the Finance Committee, as representing the integrity, the good faith, and the patriotism of the Republican Party on the questions of finance, should take this bill back into its committee and bring out a bill based upon our resources which we ourselves may dare to put before our constituencies to-day and be willing to defend before them, and not put the burden upon posterity nor upon the foreigner to take care of American soldiers.

Another thing, Mr. President. Let us look at the land-settlement provisions of the bill. Why is it called a "land settlement"? This is the land settlement which is offered to the American soldiers:

SEC. 601. On the opening of public or Indian lands to entry, or the restoration to entry of public lands theretofore withdrawn from entry, such opening or restoration shall, in the order therefor, provide for a period of not less than 60 days before the general opening of such lands to disposal, in which period veterans who have chosen the benefits of this title shall have a preferred right of entry under the homestead or desert land laws.

The soldier is given the munificent opportunity of going out and having a preference right for 60 days in connection with any opening of Indian lands or public lands with reference to homestead or desert-land entry. I think I know something about the condition of public land in the United States, and any soldier who goes there will have very little contest, indeed, in these days, very little opposition to securing the first choice. All public lands of the United States upon which men can make homes without having a fortune to start with have been exhausted. You can no longer go into the great prairies or the fertile valleys of the West and select out great agricultural areas and locate yourself, and there build a home by simply the efforts of yourself, your wife, and your children. They have been taken up to such an extent that there are no longer lands except those which are harsh in their nature, difficult to reclaim, and require not only extraordinary effort but a bank account to start with. Yet the only land-settlement proposition here is to give the soldier an opportunity for 60 days to get that piece of land which nobody in the world is now trying to get.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. McNARY. I want to state to the Senator from Idaho that that provision is the present law.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but the Legion did not know that.

Mr. BORAH. The Sinnott resolution covers the matter practically as it is in this bill.

Mr. President, I should like to see the United States Government without any expenditure, but simply by the loaning of its credit, aid the soldier who wants to acquire a home or who wants to acquire a place in which to live. I should like to see the Government undertake that task, and it could do so ultimately without the expenditure of a single dollar of money. The most important feature connected with the entire soldier settlement or compensation proposition is that of enabling the soldier who desires it to acquire a home or to acquire a piece of land by purchase or in any way that it can be secured by law; and there could be provisions made, based upon the principle of the reclamation law and the swamp-land law, by which the Government, by loaning him credit or by assisting him to get credit, could aid him in his personal endeavor to secure his home. To that kind of a proposition I can give my assent; but proposing here a so-called land settlement, which is no land settlement at all, to secure him a home where there is no home and no method by which he can get a home, is not dealing fairly with the soldier upon that question.

I am informed by a member of the American Legion that over 150,000 soldiers have already signified their desire to acquire homes or small farms if they could have assistance—not gifts, not donations, but that which would sustain them until their energy and their industry would work it out—which is a laudable thing upon their part, and would be an honorable thing upon the Government's part and in accord with proper governmental and economic principles.

The farm or home aid provision, Title V, is a little better, but very little. It gives no aid to the soldier except the aid which he may get by virtue of this extra compensation, which is provided for.

So, Mr. President, altogether the most important part of this bill, that which would contribute to the industry, the frugality, the encouragement of the soldier in securing a home, is an absolute blank in the bill.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has left the Chamber, but I wanted to ask either the Senator from Indiana or some one else who speaks here with authority whether it is really proposed to undertake to put this measure through as an expression of the good faith of the Republican Party toward the soldier of the late war? It is now nearly three years since he came home, and we propose to give him $50 upon the first day of July, 1922, and $50 every four months thereafter until he gets $500.

Mr. President, an investigation now being carried on is revealing the neglect which this Government has been guilty of toward those who came back from the war broken in health and mangled in body and possibly shattered in mind. The excuse is that we have been hard pressed to find the funds. Let us take care in a proper, even generous way of these brave fellows who have felt the dread curse of war. And let us postpone this matter until that sacred obligation is fulfilled. Every ex-service man would, in my opinion, gladly acquiesce in such a course. I do not desire to say more to-day, but later this matter shall have further consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a few moments ago, when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] was speaking, I ventured to propound a question, and called his attention to a statement made by James G. Blaine relative to the Walker tariff. The Senator and I did not quite agree as to the statement of Mr. Blaine. I therefore sent for Mr. Blaine's work, Twenty Years of Congress, and I will read a line or two from page 196 of the first volume.

In speaking of the Walker tariff bill, Mr. Blaine says:

The Whig victory of 1848 was not sufficiently decisive to warrant any attempt, even had there been desire, to change the tariff. Gen. Taylor had been elected without subscribing to a platform or pledging himself to a specific measure, and he was therefore in a position to resist and reject appeals of the ordinary partisan character.

May I add, by way of parenthesis, Mr. President, that unfortunately the Republican Party now does not occupy the commanding position held by the Whig Party then, nor does it possess that moral advantage that was enjoyed by the last-named party. It is not in a position to repel the demands for prohibitive tariffs and embargoes which now are pressed by those seeking special privileges and monopolistic advantages, and the result of which will be that a tariff act will soon be offered by the Republican Party which will be a discredit to such party and injurious and oppressive to the people of the United States.

Money became very abundant after the year 1849.

That is, when the Walker Tariff Act was in operation.

Large enterprises were undertaken, speculation was prevalent, and for a considerable period the prosperity of the country was general and apparently genuine. After 1852 the Democrats had almost undisputed control of the Government and had gradually become a free-trade party.

I do not agree with Mr. Blaine in the last statement. The Democratic Party never was a free-trade party.

The principles embodied in the tariff of 1846—

That is, the Walker tariff—seemed for the time to be so entirely vindicated and approved that resistance to it ceased, not only among the people but among the protective economists, and even among the manufacturers to a large extent. So general was this acquiescence that in 1856 a protective tariff was not suggested or even hinted by any one of the three parties which presented presidential candidates.

Mr. President, that, in substance, is what I declared; and it is a vindication by Mr. Blaine of the tariff act of 1846, under which general prosperity was enjoyed by the American people.

SEASONAL COAL RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1806) to further amend the interstate commerce act, as amended, to provide for seasonal rates for the transportation of coal.

Mr. KING. I offer two amendments to the pending bill and ask that they may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. STANLEY. I offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I present certain amendments, which I request may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 24, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 23, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, Thou art the judge of all things in Heaven and in earth. Reveal unto us those things that are wise and prudent that all of our labors may be rooted in intelligent conviction. In the performance of duty may we choose to suffer inconvenience and even loss rather than lower the standards of our efficiency. So teach us that our hearts may blossom charity. Then shall we be loving and considerate and do unto others as we would have them do unto us. Where there is distress and suffering give the vision of a new heart for the tasks of daily life. In the Spirit of Jesus we ask. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 2499. An act to provide for the acquisition by the United States of private rights of fishery in and about Pearl Harbor, Territory of Hawaii;

H. J. Res. 82. Joint resolution ratifying the reestablishment of the boundary line between the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware; and

H. R. 5616. An act granting the consent of Congress to the commissioners of Venango County, their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Allegheny River, in the State of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 78. An act authorizing the appointment of an additional judge for the district of North Dakota;

S. 694. An act providing for the appointment of an additional district judge for the southern judicial district of the State of West Virginia; and

S. J. Res. 34. Joint resolution creating a commission to represent the United States in the celebration of the first centennial of the proclamation of the independence of the Republic of Peru.

PACKER BILL.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6320, to disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the packers bill, to disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 6320) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in live stock, live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, poultry products, and eggs, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the gentleman consulted the ranking minority member, Mr. JACOWAY?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have.

Mr. GARNER. Is it agreeable to him for the bill to go to conference?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, may I ask the chairman of the committee whether it may be his purpose, and I apprehend it will be, for the conferees to insist upon the House bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is always the purpose, that is always expected, and is the usual course pursued, and in this case that seems absolutely necessary. The bill has been materially weakened by the number of amendments.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think the Senate has very materially changed the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is materially weakened, and with the amendments in the bill I doubt that it would be worth while enacting it into law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, Mr. WARD of New York, Mr. JACOWAY, and Mr. RAINEY of Illinois.

FISH-RESCUE STATION.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was ordered when the House adjourned on the bill to establish a fish-rescue station on the Mississippi River. The vote now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is clear there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anderson	Gahn	Little	Sanders, N. Y.
Ansorge	Gallivan	Longworth	Sears
Anthony	Gilbert	Luhring	Slemp
Bell	Goldsborough	McCormick	Smith
Bland, Ind.	Good	Mann	Snell

Fish	Lampert	Rogers	Winslow
Focht	Langley	Rose	Wise
Fordney	Layton	Rouse	Yates
Frear	Leatherwood	Rucker	Zihlman
Freeman	Linthicum	Ryan

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and eleven Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, as Members of the House know, the Navy Department has been conducting a number of experiments off the Virginia Capes in reference to striking and the destruction of war vessels. The first experiment has already been held. It began on Monday and ended yesterday afternoon. The second experiment will take place next Monday. Then there will be one or two following that. The experiment that has just taken place was witnessed by the following members of the Committee on Naval Affairs: Mr. MCCLINTIC, Mr. LUFKIN, Mr. MCPHERSON, Mr. O'CONNOR, Mr. STEPHENS, and myself, and that is the reason those members of the Committee on Naval Affairs have not been present during the sessions of the House the present week. I desire to add that these experiments were not only interesting and instructive, but of great value from a military standpoint, and they were carried out with dispatch, thoroughness, and without accident.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed this morning in reference to a fish-rescue station on the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5010) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes, and had agreed to House amendments to Senate amendments 3, 9, 10, and 41.

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL FARM LOAN ACT.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 122.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1837) entitled "An act to amend section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act."

That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed three hours and be divided and controlled equally between the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the amendment reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule and considered as an original bill. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been agreed to, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

On page 1, line 9, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four," so that the line will read: "That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed four hours."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would the gentleman from Kansas object to making it five instead of four hours?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Personally, I would not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. My only interest with respect to the further extension of the debate would be the question as to whether or not it would interfere with the passage of the bill to-day. I am very anxious that the bill shall be passed before we adjourn. I wonder if we could proceed with the debate under the arrangement as provided in the rule, and then if it were found necessary provide additional time later in the day?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The only difficulty about that is that the House will be in the Committee of the Whole at that time, and general debate can not be extended.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The committee could rise for the purpose, if it was found necessary to extend the time. I am very anxious that the bill be passed to-day, and I am sure the gentleman from Tennessee is.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. WALSH. What is the effect of the language in the rule providing for consideration under the 5-minute rule, "that it shall be considered as an original bill"?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That it shall be subject to amendment under the 5-minute rule as though it were an original bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, it has just one section and there will be only one 5-minute rule. Let me say to the gentleman from Kansas that I think many Members did not know that this matter was coming up to-day, Members who are very much interested in this proposition, and it seems to me that a request for five hours might very well be acceded to.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have not the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, in view of the general interest in this bill and in view of the fact that it is of such a nature that it will necessarily take a short time under the 5-minute rule, I ask unanimous consent to amend the report by inserting "five hours" instead of "four hours."

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas if a Member who wishes to discuss agriculture in a general way and at the same time touch upon this bill would be prevented from doing it in general debate by the rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The rule provides that it shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill, but agriculture is a very extensive subject.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is a question the Chair will have to determine if anybody makes the point of order.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the time for general debate is extended to five hours and there will follow discussion under the 5-minute rule, the gentleman realizes we may be here at 7 o'clock, when it looks to many of us that this is brought in to fill in the day and to kill time. To keep us here under those circumstances until 7 o'clock would be unreasonable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman know that this law is intended to benefit those that have to work longer than that?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I venture that there will not be a dozen votes against it, and the length of time we intend to take for discussion is, in my judgment, unnecessary and unreasonable.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In answer to the gentleman from Michigan, if it is found necessary to do so, the vote on the bill could go over until to-morrow morning after the previous question has been ordered. I submit that the matter is of great interest to Members as well as to the country, and we might spend the time to-day discussing the bill. The time for general debate under the 5-minute rule will necessarily be limited.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. What I think is, that if the general debate is to be continued so long, the vote ought to be put off until to-morrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think that may be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] asks unanimous consent that general debate be five hours instead of four. Is there objection?

Mr. LAZARO. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. LAZARO. Would the gentleman object to removing the restriction confining the debate?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In view of the fact that we are extending the time because of the general interest in the subject matter, I think we should confine it to the subject matter of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I suppose the gentleman from Kansas intends to move the previous question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that there is to be general debate on the resolution. There has been 10 minutes' debate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was on a unanimous request for amendment.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker, I will state that the general agreement in the Committee on Rules was that the chairman would move the previous question so as to have a few minutes' debate on the rule. I want only five minutes. That was the procedure that we supposed was being followed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no desire to prevent that. The only question for the Chair is to observe the rules of the House. The Chair will be glad to hear suggestions.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There was no contest in the Committee on Rules. The only thing was on the matter of time to be taken for debate. When the gentleman from Kansas presented the resolution I rose and asked him if before he proceeded he would consider a suggestion of changing the four hours, which he had requested, to five hours.

The SPEAKER. Was not that debate on the resolution?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No. That did not debate the rule, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see why not, unless there is a change in the rule. The Chair suggests that the gentleman ask unanimous consent that there be 20 minutes' debate on the rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would prefer that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] should make that request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Kansas that he should ask unanimous consent that there should be 20 minutes' debate on the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How much time does the gentleman from Kentucky desire?

Mr. CANTRILL. Not exceeding 10 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that there be 15 minutes' debate on the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that there shall be 15 minutes' debate on the rule, of which time the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] shall have 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], there was no opposition in the Committee on Rules to this resolution. In fact, the Members on the minority side are extremely anxious that this resolution should be adopted, so as to make in order this Senate bill, with the hope that it will speedily be concurred in by the House.

We all know that the farm loan act is now indorsed by practically everybody in the country. There have been heretofore several handicaps in getting the act in full operation. This bill is intended to supplement the original act so that it will be of more service to the agricultural interests of the Nation. Of course, upon a proposition like that there would be but little, if any, opposition from any source in the House of Representatives.

I realize fully, Mr. Speaker, that the House is anxious to get into the merits of this bill, and I am not going to stand in the way of the House by taking up any time as a member of the Committee on Rules. The main reason why I took the floor at all was to call attention to the fact that there was no opposition to the rule from the minority members of the Committee on Rules, and, as I am informed, it is a practically unanimous report from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

What I wanted to do primarily was to ask the consent of the House to incorporate in the RECORD a report from the committee on comparative credit extension, as adopted at a meeting of the National Farmers' Union in Washington, D. C., on April 22 of this year. This is a very short report, and to my mind it is one of the strongest reports that has been written on the subject of agriculture. These heads of the various farm bureaus held a meeting in the city of Washington during the month of April and adopted this set of resolutions, which are very brief, and they will, I think, throw a great deal of light not only on this bill but upon subsequent discussions in the House, and will be of great interest to the special committee which has been appointed to make a general survey of the agricultural conditions of the country. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to incorporate as a part of my remarks this short report of this committee of the National Farmers' Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to incorporate in his remarks the report indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the report referred to:

LOSSES OF FARMERS, CAUSES AND RESPONSIBILITY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON COMPARATIVE CREDIT EXTENSION AS ADOPTED AT THE MASS MEETING OF THE NATIONAL FARMERS' UNION, WASHINGTON, D. C., APRIL 22, 1921.

In reference to the losses of the farmer and the causes, responsibilities, and remedies therefor, your committee reports as follows:

The world demand is and at all times during and since the war has been greater than the supply of farm products. If, therefore, the law of supply and demand had been in force the farmer would have sustained no loss.

The farmer produced his last crops under the most expensive conditions and at the greatest cost. Therefore he was entitled to the highest prices and in justice there should have been no deflation of prices for these crops.

Based upon these facts and taking account of all deflation up to date, the farmer has sustained a total loss of $7,000,000,000.

The principal direct causes of these losses are as follows:

1. Unnecessary profiteering of middlemen, which includes speculative gambling.

2. The arbitrary restrictions of credit by the Federal reserve bank and the holding up of the Federal land banks by litigation.

3. The unreasonable rise in railroad rates.

All of these causes have been created by autocratic economic power exercised under unjust laws.

Profiteering and speculation of middlemen is shown by the following facts:

The farmer is both a producer and a consumer.

The laborer is both a producer and a consumer.

Each is the principal customer of the products of the other.

Out of the dollar which labor pays for the products of the farm, the farmer only gets 38 cents.

Out of the dollar which the farmer pays for the products of labor, the laboring man only gets 35 cents.

The cost of distribution each way is over 60 cents on the dollar, and against this might be cited a cost of less than 10 cents in cooperative Denmark.

We can not reduce distribution to 10 cents in America, but it might be reduced to 20 cents. This would make a saving of 42 cents on farm products. If the farmer seeks to take all of this, he will receive no help from the public. If he is willing to cooperate and divide with his consumers, the principal of which is the laboring man, he can add over 50 per cent to the price of his products and give a reduction equal in amount to his consumer. In this all labor will gladly join.

On the other hand, there should be a saving of 45 cents in the dollar in the distribution of the products of labor. If labor seeks to take it all, it will fail. If it is willing to divide with its principal consumer, the farmer, it will succeed.

The total wages of labor are approximately $25,000,000,000, and this goes to about 35 per cent of our people.

The total value of farm products since the deflation, including all sold and all used by the farmers themselves, does not exceed $20,000,000,000 and that goes to about 43 per cent of our people.

If all of the returns of the farmer be counted as wages, he gets 20 per cent less total than the wages of labor and there are 20 per cent more farmers than laborers.

In addition to this the farmer had a capital investment of $80,000,000,000 upon which he got no return, although mortgages upon it called for vast amounts of interest.

The business and other capital investments were about double farm capital, and if they had received the same return it might therefore take two ciphers to express it. Instead, this capital and the speculators got a return of about $20,000,000,000, and this went to about 7 per cent of our people. A just distribution of this sum would give the farmers more than $7,000,000,000 increase with but slight readjustment of the wages of labor. The capital of the farmer is just as sacred as the capital of the Steel Trust, the Oil Trust, the Beef Trust, the Tobacco Trust, the Cotton Trust, the Sugar Trust, the Railroad Trust, or the Telephone Trust, and is entitled to an equal return.

The conclusions from these facts are inevitable. The producers and consumers composed of farmers and all necessary labor of hand or brain in both production and distribution must join in such complete economic and political cooperation as to take over the distribution of their products from producer to consumer. This calls for a cooperative code, both State and National, upon the Rochdale principle.

In both the economic and political action necessary to bring this about we will be opposed by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, because it represents both the profits of the middlemen and the speculator.

The total rediscounts of the Federal reserve bank were $14,000,000,000. Of this sum agriculture received 14 per cent, manufacturing 21 per cent, merchandising 26 per cent, and speculation and miscellaneous 39 per cent.

Of the primary deposits in all the banks of the United States, agriculture furnished approximately 50 per cent, labor 20 per cent, and other business 30 per cent. Upon these facts agriculture would have been entitled to $7,000,000,000 of Federal reserve credit and it got only $2,000,000,000; it was entitled to more than manufacturing and merchandising combined and it got less than one-third as much. Under the law the Federal reserve allotment of credit is unfair to agriculture and in addition its administration has had the direct and arbitrary purpose of forcing a deflation in farm prices.

This conclusion is best illustrated by the facts in a single State. In Iowa the allotment of credit under the law was $36,000,000. They in fact loaned Iowa $91,000,000, but as early as February, 1920, announced these excess loans would be called when the crops were matured. This forced Iowa farmers to sell on a falling market, and sent more farmers into bankruptcy than in all the history of the State.

If Iowa's allotment has been an average of the States, it would have been nearly $300,000,000 instead of $36,000,000. But Iowa is far more than an average in resources. It was fifth in assessed valuation in 1919, and upon that basis was entitled to eight one hundred and thirty-fourths, or an allotment of $832,000,000. In fact, it got $91,000,000, and was called for two-thirds of that.

This illustrates the position of agriculture throughout the United States. As a result of this credit monopoly the speculators were enabled to force down the price of wheat 70 cents per bushel to the American farmer in 1920. At the same time they forced it up 33 cents a bushel to the starving millions of Europe. Over 300,000,000 bushels moved on this spread, and not over $60,000,000 could be charged to increased freight rates. Therefore the speculators by this control of credit were enabled to take an extra toll of $240,000,000 upon export wheat alone.

The remedy for this is to amend the law and require the Federal reserve to allot credit in proportion to resources, and deny all credit directly or indirectly to speculation.

Also we must have a cooperative banking code, both State and National, which enables the farmers to deposit their money under their own control and themselves decide how their surplus shall be allotted to other lines of business.

The functions of the Federal land bank should be enlarged until it will furnish long-time credits large enough in volume and cheap enough in rate to enable every farmer to own his own home.

The rise in freight rates as farm prices fall is a flagrant extortion. It is caused by a cost-plus guaranty law that puts a premium upon waste, extravagance, and mismanagement. Under this law a valuation of $18,800,000,000 is put upon the railroads. At the same time their stock and all their bonds representing all their value could be bought on the market for less than $14,000,000,000. Heretofore we have regarded this value too high, but this law has added to it over $5,000,000,000 of water. It is said the advance in wages of labor caused the advance in rates. Last year maintenance expense increased $1,406,000,000, but the amount paid for increased wages was only $480,000,000. This leaves $926,000,000 to explain. It is next said the causes were the high prices of steel and coal, but the same men who controlled the railroads controlled the prices of steel and coal. When the Government was operating the Pennsylvania and New York Central their locomotives were repaired in their own shops at a cost of $4,466 each. After the roads were turned back the men in these shops were discharged, and 299 locomotives were sent to the Baldwin Co., at a cost of $19,057 each for the same work. The Baldwin Co. is controlled by the same men who control the roads. Therefore they got more profits by increasing the expenses over 300 per cent, most of which the farmer must pay.

A unified Government regulation, under the management of honest and competent men, would reduce costs of transportation in vast amounts. The railroads now have about $10,000,000,000 of capital at an average rate of 4½ per cent. Upon all this they have a guaranty of 6 per cent. This means a bonus of $150,000,000. Add to this the guaranty on capital above market value and there would be a saving of $450,000,000 on capital charge alone. Seven hundred millions could be saved on coal, steel, and other expenses when the power of the trusts is broken. The waste of competition could be reduced by over $400,000,000. The capitalization of unearned increment at the rate of over $300,000,000 per year would be saved. These items make a grand total of nearly $2,000,000,000, most of which could be used in the reduction of rates, with proper readjustment of wages. The farmers pay 56 per cent of the freight rates, and have a just demand for this reduction.

To these must be added a general remedy of taxation. The millions made out of the war must be taxed to pay for the war. Up to date they have paid nothing. They have added it in and passed it on to the public. These war profits must be surveyed and a tax levied which they will pay and not pass on, in an amount sufficient to pay for the war, including any adjustment compensation that may be granted to the men who were drafted, at $30 per month.

We request that a copy of this report be presented to the President and each member of his Cabinet, and to each Member in both Houses of Congress.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have only this to say concerning this rule: It provides for the consideration of a bill that has already passed the Senate and has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, a bill in which that portion of the country engaged in agriculture is very vitally interested. I think the bill should have the attention of the House to-day, and that we should vote upon it as early as possible and have it sent to the President, so that it can become a law.

I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 1837.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1837, reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1837, with Mr. MADDEN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1837, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1837) to amend section 32 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 32 of the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916, as amended, is hereby amended by adding after the first paragraph a new paragraph to read as follows:

"Until such time as the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks shall be $50,000,000 or more, the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion make deposits in addition to those authorized by the preceding paragraph, to be secured, redeemed, and paid in the same manner as provided in such paragraph, except that any additional deposit made hereunder shall be called by the Secretary of the Treasury and redeemed by the bank or banks holding the same within 15 days after the conclusion of each general offering of farm loan bonds by such bank or banks. The aggregate of such additional deposits outstanding at any time shall not exceed the difference between the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks on the last day of the preceding month and the sum of $50,000,000. The certificates of indebtedness issued to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Federal land bank for such additional deposits shall bear a rate of interest not exceeding by more than one-half of 1 per cent per annum the rate borne by the last bond issue of the land bank receiving such deposits."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, as I noticed the reading, the Clerk did not report the original bill. The original bill should be reported. In other words, the original bill should be reported and the committee amendment, because we are going into the committee on a Senate bill, and the rule provides that in the consideration of that bill we should consider the House amendment as an original bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] and I are not disagreeing about the matter. I want simply to get it in the RECORD, so that the RECORD will disclose all of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the terms of the rule, where the rule provides that the House amendment shall be considered as an orginial bill, the Senate bill has never been read.

Mr. WINGO. That is true where the rule provides that a certain House bill shall be considered; but this rule provides that the House amendment to the Senate bill shall be considered as an original bill. I think that the RECORD ought to show it.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the practice it is not necessary to read the Senate bill where the rule provides that the House amendment shall be considered as an original bill, and this rule provides that the House bill shall be considered as an original bill.

Mr. WINGO. But there is a rule that requires every bill considered by the House to be reported, and that has not been done. I submit that that should be done for the RECORD.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill, S. 1837, is an amendment to section 32 of the Federal farm loan act. Section 32 of the Federal farm loan act has twice previously been amended. To get this matter clearly before you I think I had better read section 32 of the act, so that the Members may understand just what we are doing in this respect. It is as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, upon the request of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to make deposits for the temporary use of any Federal land bank out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Such Federal land bank shall issue to the Secretary of the Treasury a certificate of indebtedness for any such deposit, bearing a rate of interest not to exceed the current rate charged for other Government deposits, to be secured by farm loan bonds or other collateral, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Any such certificate shall be redeemed and paid by such land bank at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The aggregate of all sums so deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed the sum of $6,000,000 at any one time.

The purpose of this amendment is to increase the authority to deposit in excess of the $6,000,000, the difference between the paid-in capital stock of the present Federal farm loan system and $50,000,000. The present capital stock, according to the last report that I have here of the Federal farm loan system, was $24,460,000. Under that approximately $25,000,000 would be the highest amount that it would be necessary for the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit under this authority.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. DOWELL. What is the difference between the amendment reported by the committee and the Senate bill, which provides for $50,000,000?

Mr. McFADDEN. This amendment provides the authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit the difference between the paid-in capital of the farm-loan system, which I just stated was $25,000,000, and $50,000,000, on the theory, as presented to the committee by the Federal Farm Loan Board, that they require a working capital of $50,000,000 in order to accumulate sufficient mortgages to put back of the bond issues that they are periodically selling.

Mr. DOWELL. Then do I correctly understand the gentleman that this will cut the amount from $50,000,000, provided in the Senate bill, to approximately $25,000,000 in the House bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. It may practically work out that way; but I will say to the gentleman that very extensive hearings were conducted by our committee, and the members of the Farm Loan Board were present, and we were informed by the farm loan commissioner and other members of the board that the board had considered this matter and that this amendment is entirely satisfactory to them. It will permit them to function fully, to accumulate mortgages in sufficient quantities to permit them to get out their periodical bond issues in large enough amounts to supply the bond-distributing agencies with these bonds so that they can be sold to good advantage. I will say to the gentleman further that the Farm Loan Board are not asking any additional authority except this amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Am I correct, then, in concluding that the working capital of the Federal loan bank system will consist of the paid-in capital of those banks plus Federal money which may be advanced to them upon security offered by them to the Federal Treasury?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; under this authority they must deposit farm loan bonds or other Government securities that are acceptable to the Secretary.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Up to the total sum of $50,000,000.

Mr. McFADDEN. Up to the total sum advanced, or $25,000,000, which is the amount of required working capital which the board say they must have. I will say that there is an additional safeguard in this, because the act as we have it drawn provides that each time when the Secretary deposits this money and the sale of bonds has been consummated the return of this advance shall be made to the Secretary of the Treasury, and then the Farm Loan Board, when they begin to accumulate mortgages in their attempts to satisfy the demands of the farmers, will call upon the Treasury for funds again. Then when they get out a periodical bond issue of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 the money is again returned to the Public Treasury and the action is again repeated.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I will suggest to the gentleman that there will be a time when this amount of deposit will be unnecessary.

Mr. McFADDEN. I was just going to state that. You gentlemen will recall that the original act provides that borrowers under this system must subscribe to the capital stock of this system up to 5 per cent of the amount of their loans, so this paid-in capital of $24,000,000 has been subscribed all but $6,000,000 and paid in by the farmer borrowers. So automatically, as the volume of loans increases, the capital stock increases 5 per cent on the aggregate thereof, so that under the normal workings of this system during a normal period of three years the capital should automatically be increased to $50,000,000. When that time arrives I believe that this system will be able to operate without the assistance of the Public Treasury. To my mind, this is one of the strong features in connection with the passage of this measure. I want to direct the attention of those people who do not like the idea of making appropriations from the Public Treasury to that particular clause, because it is a saving clause and provides for the operation of this system until such time as the capital is sufficient so that the system can work without aid from the Public Treasury.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is there any other risk to the Public Treasury than the possible depreciation of the securities deposited by the farm loan bank?

Mr. McFADDEN. Nothing except the ordinary business risks. I think there are sufficient safeguards here to protect the Public Treasury, because of the fact that at all times they must hold the obligation of the Federal farm loan system, and back of that they have all of the bonds and mortgages which they have not sold, and in addition the capital stock which has already been paid in; and I believe it is sufficiently protected, so that the Public Treasury is running nothing more than the usual risk where money is deposited in banks.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Has the Federal Treasury a prior lien upon the paid-up capital stock ahead of the stock owners?

Mr. McFADDEN. It has a prior lien ahead of the stockholders, but not against any other obligations which the farm loan system may have out.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman know how the Senate happened to provide $50,000,000 in the bill that they passed?

Mr. McFADDEN. That was an arbitrary sum. In consultation with the Federal Farm Loan Board I understand they thought that was the amount they should have, and in discussion of that with Senator CURTIS, I believe, they arbitrarily arrived at that amount; but I am glad to say to the gentleman that members of the committee have consulted with Senator CURTIS, and that this amendment is entirely agreeable to him.

Mr. BRIGGS. Was it not at the instance of the Federal Farm Loan Board that the $50,000,000 was asked for as provided by the Senate?

Mr. McFADDEN. I can not say as to that, but it was evidently in consultation with them.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I direct the gentleman's attention to the first paragraph of the bill, on page 2, line 14, and following. May I ask if it was the intention of the committee to limit the deposits made by the Secretary of the Treasury up to such time as the combined capital of the Federal farm loan banks reached $50,000,000?

Mr. McFADDEN. That was the idea; yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If that is the case, I would like to ask if the gentleman does not think that the words "or more," lines 15 and 16, remove that limitation and practically make the deposit sky high?

Mr. McFADDEN. No; that is not the fact. If the gentleman will read further along in the bill, he will see that the deposits are limited until the paid-in capital is $50,000,000, and if we put that restriction at $50,000,000 it would stop the functioning of the system when the paid-in capital reaches $50,000,000.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thought that was the intent. May I say that if that is the intent, to permit the deposits to be made up to the point when the capital reaches $50,000,000, the words "or more" would practically leave the thing limitless, except so far as you may modify it further on in the bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. When the paid-in capital of the system reaches $50,000,000, the system will be self-operating; it will not need to call on the Treasury. They have a right to go up and increase the capital all the law will permit and use the additional capital to relieve the farming interests on demand for a loan.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does not the gentleman think that under the terms of the bill the Secretary of the Treasury might be called upon to make advances on the deposits in the Federal loan bank even when all the capital has exceeded the sum of $50,000,000?

Mr. McFADDEN. He might be called upon by the Farm Loan Board, but there is nothing in the act that would compel him to respond.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is not the limitation in the line I have directed attention to such as to permit him to have the authority in case he is requested?

Mr. McFADDEN. I call the gentleman's attention to line 24, where it says:

> The aggregate of such additional deposits outstanding at any time shall not exceed the difference between the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks on the last day of the preceding month and the sum of $50,000,000.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Can the gentleman state the amount of loans that have been applied for to date and not acted upon from lack of capital?

Mr. McFADDEN. We tried to get that information from the Federal Farm Loan Board. It has been variously estimated at between $75,000,000 and $300,000,000. I believe if all of the applications on file were systematically reported we would find that there were $300,000,000 of applications for loans in farming communities on hand at this time. I would say for the information of the House that the report of March 31, 1921, shows up to date farm loan bonds outstanding amounting to $332,000,000 and net mortgage loans amounting to $348,000,000.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. I note that it provides in line 22, "within 15 days after the conclusion of each general offering of farm loan bonds by such bank or banks." I take it that that only means after the conclusion of the sale.

Mr. McFADDEN. That means at the conclusion of the sale of the bonds.

Mr. HOCH. If it means only the sale of the bonds, 15 days would be a long enough time, but if any other interpretation is placed on it 15 days would not be a sufficient length of time.

Mr. McFADDEN. The committee gave careful consideration to that and they feel that it clearly expresses the intent.

Mr. HOCH. But it says "after the conclusion of each general offering."

Mr. McFADDEN. When the money is finally paid in from the syndicate that buys the bonds that compels the system within 15 days to pay on all advances they have made up to that point.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I am wondering how this will operate as between banks. The bank at Minneapolis, for illustration, has a larger demand for farm loans than some banks in other areas, and I would like to know if this system will automatically adjust itself so that help can be extended to banks where there is the greatest demand.

Mr. McFADDEN. That is a matter of administrative operation. When questioned in regard to the distribution of funds the members of the board asserted that there would be an equitable distribution of the funds throughout the entire country, giving due consideration to those sections where the need was the most acute.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The intention on the part of the board, then, is to try to take care of the localities where the demand is the greatest and the need is the most acute?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; but that is an administrative matter pure and simple.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. I want to say to the gentleman from South Dakota, further answering his question, that his suggestion occurred to me for the reason that I represent a constituency where the need for farm loans is accentuated at this time. If we undertake to fix by law the distribution of the funds among various loan banks, it would, in all probability, result in the declaration of law to require the funds to be prorated among the different banks. That might result in some banks getting their share of the funds where they least need it, so that by leaving the matter of distribution in the hands of the board it will at least give the board a chance to give preference, if it is practical to do so, to the sections most in need of accommodation.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I think the gentleman is right, and if that is the policy of the board I think that will accomplish the greatest good.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Recently I have heard some complaints or dissatisfaction in certain parts of the country due to the fact that they were unable to secure application blanks. Can the gentleman explain why the board is not now issuing application blanks?

Mr. McFADDEN. I could not explain that. That is an administrative matter, but it might grow out of the fact that during the past year the system has not been able to function or sell any of its securities, and it might be that they wanted to hold back applications on that account until they got the proceeds from the last sale of their bonds, which proceeds are now in. I can see no reason why, in view of that, they should not furnish any and all with application blanks.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I heard the gentleman say that he thought probably there would be $300,000,000 in applications provided the bank could function. If it be a fact that some people are unable to secure applications, there might be a great deal more. Does the gentleman know whether the bonds have been sold?

Mr. McFADDEN. The report yesterday morning was to the effect that all of the last issue of $40,000,000 of bonds has been sold except about $400,000. I understand it is the disposition of the board, as soon as they can make arrangements and the market is stable, to get out an additional issue of bonds this fall.

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GENSMAN. I have had considerable inquiry from my part of the country with regard to the question of whether or not there would be any change in the law with respect to the association to be formed before loans can be obtained. Has the gentleman's committee had under consideration any revision or amendment to the law pertaining to the forming of the association necessary before loans can be obtained?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that I would say that there is not immediately before the committee for consideration any measure looking to that end. However, there is a widespread agitation looking to the simplification of the filing of applications, and many banks feel that they are being discriminated against because they can not themselves receive applications and close the papers incident to the granting of the loans. They feel in some sections that because a certain bank is designated to act for this system it draws business from other institutions. They are claiming the right, and that is particularly true in the State of Minnesota, of having power to close loans with their own customers and then turn the applications and all papers over to the local Federal farm loan bank for the district. The committee, however, as yet has not taken up the consideration of any measure looking to that end. There is quite a discussion going on throughout the country on that particular subject.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. A. P. NELSON.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I am wondering if the language of the bill fully or accurately expresses the purpose of the committee; and I am now speaking of the amendment that the gentleman's committee has offered. It seems to be the purpose and intention to make available for the use of these banks at least $50,000,000.

Mr. McFADDEN. That is the purpose.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. By adding to their capital such deposits as the Secretary of the Treasury can make; but the bill says:

> Until such time as the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks shall be $50,000,000, or more.

That is, until they are $50,000,000, or $60,000,000, or $70,000,000, or $100,000,000 the Secretary shall make deposits.

Mr. McFADDEN. No; the Secretary makes deposits up until the time that their capital stock reaches $50,000,000.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Or more.

Mr. McFADDEN. And not beyond that point. I explained that a few moments ago.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not see the meaning of the words "or more" there.

Mr. McFADDEN. If we took out those words at that point, it would stop the functioning of the Federal farm loan system when its capital had arrived at $50,000,000. The system will be self-supporting when the capital reaches $50,000,000, in the estimation of the Federal Farm Loan Board and the members of the committee.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman's first answer was to the effect that the purpose of the bill is to keep the treasuries of these Federal banks up to at least $50,000,000.

Mr. McFADDEN. Until the paid-in capital reaches $50,000,000. Then there will be sufficient capital in the system to operate it without aid from the Public Treasury.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I do not see when the Secretary of the Treasury is to stop making deposits, because this says when the capital stock is $50,000,000 or more.

Mr. McFADDEN. I call the gentleman's attention to lines 24 and 25 on page 2:

> The aggregate of such additional deposits outstanding at any time shall not exceed the difference between the aggregate paid-in capital stock of the 12 Federal land banks on the last day of the preceding month and the sum of $50,000,000.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That may correct it, but the statement seems inconsistent.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. As I understand it, the cash already on hand consists of 5 per cent of the borrowed money.
